INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Dans l'avant-propos du rapport de son ministère pour 1960, le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Howard Green, disait ceci : « La plupart des événements marquants des dernières années doivent évidemment être examinés dans le cadre des rapports Est-Ouest; toute analyse du climat international tient forcément compte du degré d'harmonie entre l'univers communiste et le monde non communiste ».[1] Dans cette optique, disait Green, l'année 1960 a suscité de grands espoirs qui, cependant, se sont effondrés de façon dramatique. Le sommet auquel avaient convenu de participer le président américain Dwight Eisenhower et le dirigeant soviétique Nikita Khrouchtchev, en décembre 1959, devait se tenir en mai à Paris. Même si le Canada n'y était pas représenté, les politiciens et les diplomates canadiens s'intéressaient de très près aux préparatifs menés par l'Organisation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord (OTAN).

Plus tôt dans l'année, les perspectives de réussite du nouveau Comité des dix puissances sur le désarmement semblaient également très favorables. Le Canada faisait partie de cet organe créé en septembre 1959. En mars 1960, le Comité se réunit à Genève pour une première session qui, contre toute attente, s'avéra ardue et frustrante, puis il suspendit ensuite ses travaux pendant la tenue du sommet. Les Canadiens assistèrent avec désarroi à l'échec de ce sommet, provoquée par la révélation que des avions-espions américains avaient survolé le territoire de l'Union soviétique (URSS). L'ambassadeur du Canada à Moscou, David Johnson, était présent lorsque dans un discours, Khrouchtchev annonça la capture du pilote américain Francis Gary Powers. « Nous nous attendions à tout un spectacle, rapporta Johnson non sans ironie, et malheureusement, nous n'avons pas été déçus. Ce fut un moment sublime pour Khrouchtchev, mais pas pour l'Ouest » (document 180).

Le Comité des dix puissances sur le désarmement reprit ses travaux en juin, mais les abandonna après le départ hâtif des représentants de l'Union soviétique, de la Bulgarie, de la Tchécoslovaquie, de la Pologne et de la Roumanie. Pendant tout l'été, les diplomates canadiens, dirigés par un Howard Green déterminé, réclamèrent la convocation rapide de la Commission du désarmement des Nations Unies, mais en vain. En même temps, la situation au Congo, au Laos et à Cuba contribua aussi à anéantir les espoirs d'une plus grande harmonie internationale qui s'étaient manifestés en début d'année. Chacun de ces conflits de la guerre froide eut d'importantes répercussions sur le gouvernement du Canada.

La crise du Congo commença en juillet, avec la révolte contre le régime belge dans la province du Katanga. Les désaccords au Conseil de sécurité de l'Organisation des Nations Unies (ONU) entre les puissances occidentales et l'Union soviétique firent comprendre rapidement que les luttes de la guerre froide allaient largement infléchir le cours des événements à venir. Le Canada soutint sans réserve les tentatives menées par le secrétaire général de l'ONU, Dag Hammarskjöld, pour « faire en sorte que la situation congolaise et même tous les problèmes politiques de

INTRODUCTION

"Most of the major events of recent years," Secretary of State for External Affairs Howard Green wrote in the foreword to his department's annual report for 1960, "have perforce had to be viewed against the background of East-West relations, and it has become customary to assess the international climate in any given period in terms of the relative degree of harmony existing between the Communist and non-Communist worlds."[1] By this standard, Green noted, 1960 was a year of high hopes raised only to be disappointed in a dramatic fashion. The Paris summit meeting, agreed to by US President Dwight Eisenhower and Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev in December 1959, was scheduled to take place in May. Though Canada was not represented at the meeting, Canadian politicians and diplomats took a keen interest in the preparations made by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

Early in the year, prospects for the success of the new Ten Nation Disarmament Committee also seemed highly favourable. Canada was a member of this body, established in September 1959. In March 1960, the Committee met in Geneva for an unexpectedly arduous and frustrating first session. Then it adjourned while the summit meeting took place. Canadians watched with dismay as the summit collapsed amid revelations of espionage by American planes over the Soviet Union. The Canadian ambassador in Moscow, David Johnson, was present at Khrushchev's speech announcing the capture of American pilot Francis Gary Powers. "[W]e expected a sensation," Johnson wryly reported, "and unfortunately were not disappointed. [I]t was a great occasion for Khrushchev but not for the West" (Document 180).

The Ten Nation Committee resumed its work in June, only to collapse in its turn when the representatives of the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Roumania walked out. Throughout the summer, Canadian diplomats, led by a determined Green, pressed for an early meeting of the United Nations Disarmament Commission, but to no avail. At the same time, the year's early promise of greater international harmony was further shattered by developments in the Congo, Laos and Cuba. Each of these Cold War conflicts had important repercussions for the Canadian government.

The Congo crisis began early in July with a revolt against Belgian rule in the province of Katanga. Disagreements in the United Nations Security Council between the Western powers and the Soviet Union soon made it clear that Cold War struggles would do much to shape the course of events. Canada gave its full support to UN Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjöld's attempts "to remove the Congo situation and indeed all political problems in Africa from the context of the cold war" (Document 10). The government approved a contribution of $1 million in aid; Canadian technical personnel joined the United Nations force in the Congo; and Canada also shared in the cost of airlifting troops and supplies. The presence of Canadian troops in the Congo was decried by the Soviet Union, and Canadian personnel were subject l'Afrique échappent au contexte de la guerre froide » (document 10). Le gouvernement approuva une contribution de un million de dollars au titre de l'aide. Du personnel technique canadien se joignit à la force des Nations Unies au Congo, et le Canada participa aux coûts du transport aérien des troupes et des fournitures. L'Union soviétique dénonça la présence de militaires canadiens au Congo, lesquels furent attaqués à deux reprises. En visite à Ottawa, le dirigeant congolais Patrice Lumumba donna l'impression que « son attitude envers les pays occidentaux et le bloc soviétique était encore incertaine et méritait un examen plus attentif », et que, sur le plan personnel, « il était vaniteux, mesquin, rustre, méfiant et peut-être sans scrupules » (document 17). Parmi les instructions qui furent données à la délégation canadienne participant à la 15e session de l'Assemblée générale de l'ONU, on lit ceci : « Ces derniers mois, non seulement les relations internationales se sont-elles gravement détériorées, mais on constate aussi, et cela est alarmant, que certains pays usent d'une rhétorique agressive et se montrent irascibles et belliqueux ». Le document se poursuit en disant qu'il y a là « un sérieux défi au prestige et à l'autorité des Nations Unies » et « qu'il est plus impératif que jamais de rappeler les nobles objectifs et principes de l'organisation. Il est particulièrement souhaitable que la délégation canadienne fasse valoir que les Nations Unies jouissent de notre total soutien » (document 96). À la fin de l'année, le ministère des Affaires extérieures réexamina la situation et réitéra avec fermeté l'attachement du Canada aux efforts de maintien de la paix déployés par l'ONU. Cela dit, le représentant permanent du Canada, Charles Ritchie, n'en informa pas moins Hammarskjöld, avec doigté, des préoccupations canadiennes concernant l'organisation et le fonctionnement de la force onusienne (documents 39 et 40).

Tout au long de l'année 1959, le Canada avait maintenu que la Commission internationale de supervision et de contrôle au Laos ne devait pas être convoquée de nouveau. Malgré les troubles qui persistaient dans ce pays, la question demeura en suspens pendant presque toute l'année 1960, du moins en ce qui concerne le Canada. En octobre cependant, elle revint au premier plan des discussions stratégiques canadiennes. Le Canada soutint les efforts déployés à l'ONU pour que le Laos et le Cambodge soient déclarés pays neutres, mais il hésita lorsque le premier ministre de l'Inde, Jawaharlal Nehru, demanda encore une fois que la Commission soit convoquée de nouveau. Les responsables indiens reçurent l'assurance qu'Ottawa « examinait promptement et avec sympathie » la proposition de Nehru (document 534). Cet examen mena cependant à la conclusion que « la réactivation de la Commission internationale de supervision et de contrôle au Laos ne semblait pas réalisable à ce moment » (document 539).

Les incidences que la situation à Cuba en 1960 eut sur le Canada se firent sentir surtout au niveau des relations bilatérales avec les États-Unis plutôt que dans les grandes enceintes des Nations Unies et de l'OTAN. Les Canadiens étaient déterminés à améliorer leurs rapports avec l'Amérique latine en général, comme en témoigne la visite extrêmement fructueuse du premier ministre Diefenbaker au Mexique et celle de Howard Green en Amérique du Sud. Le gouvernement, pleinement soutenu en to attack on two occasions. A visit to Ottawa by Congolese leader Patrice Lumumba left the impression that his "attitude as regards occidental countries and the Soviet bloc is still equivocal and warrants careful study," and that he was personally "vain, petty, boorish, suspicious and perhaps unscrupulous" (Document 17). The instructions for the Canadian delegation to the fifteenth session of the General Assembly noted that, "Recent months have seen not only a serious deterioration in international relations, but also a disturbing resort to extreme language, irritability and rocket rattling on the part of some countries." This, the instructions went on to say, posed "a grave challenge to the prestige and authority of the United Nations," and it was "perhaps more than ever before, imperative to recall the high purposes and principles of the organization. It is especially desirable for the Canadian Delegation to stress Canada's strong support for the United Nations" (Document 96). At the year's end, External Affairs reviewed the situation, and again strongly affirmed Canada's commitment to the UN's peacekeeping efforts. Concerns about the organization and operation of the United Nations force were, however, tactfully expressed to Hammarskjöld by the Canadian Permanent Representative, Charles Ritchie (Documents 39 and 40).

Throughout 1959, Canada had maintained its stand that the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos should not be reconvened. Despite the ongoing turmoil in Laos, this issue remained in abeyance, so far as Canada was concerned, throughout most of 1960. In October, however, it again came the forefront of Canadian policy discussions. Canada supported efforts in the UN to have Laos and Cambodia declared neutral, but was hesitant when Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru once again called for the reconvening of the ICSC. Indian officials were assured that Nehru's proposal was being given "urgent and sympathetic consideration in Ottawa" (Document 534) but the Canadian conclusion was that "the reactivation of the I.S.C. in Laos at present would not appear to be practicable" (Document 539).

The impact on Canada of the situation in Cuba during 1960 was felt mainly in the area of bilateral relations with the United States, rather than in the larger fora provided by the United Nations and NATO. Canadians were eager for better relations with Latin America generally, as demonstrated by Prime Minister John Diefenbaker's extremely successful visit to Mexico and Green's tour of South America. The government, fully supported by External Affairs, wished to maintain cordial relations with Cuba and to increase trade, without intending this stand as an endorsement of the Castro regime. Canadian concerns over Castro's policy of nationalization were high, and Canadian exports of military equipment to Cuba were carefully regulated. At the same time, however, Canada deliberately took a "very moderate" tone towards Cuba, in contrast to the United States, whose protests were considered by Ottawa to be excessively "vigorous and stiff." This, it was hoped, "would leave us free to play an independent role should the situation deteriorate seriously" (Document 578).

Early in July, President Eisenhower wrote a personal letter to Diefenbaker, stating that "We are facing a serious situation in the Caribbean which is obviously inviting Soviet penetration of the Western Hemisphere in Cuba" (Document 582).

cela par les Affaires extérieures, voulait maintenir des relations cordiales avec Cuba et accroître le commerce, sans pour autant avaliser le régime castriste. Le Canada craignait cependant beaucoup la politique de nationalisation pratiquée par Castro, et les exportations canadiennes de matériel militaire vers Cuba furent contrôlées minutieusement. En même temps toutefois, le Canada adopta délibérément un ton « très modéré » envers Cuba, contrairement aux États-Unis dont les protestations étaient considérées par Ottawa comme excessivement « vigoureuses et rigides ». Cette attitude, espérait-on, « nous permettra de jouer un rôle indépendant dans l'hypothèse où la situation empirerait » (document 578).

Au début de juillet, le président Eisenhower fit tenir à Diefenbaker une lettre personnelle où il dit : « La situation dans les Antilles est grave et à l'évidence, cela favorise la pénétration soviétique dans l'hémisphère occidental à travers Cuba » (document 582). Eisenhower demanda à Green de discuter de la question avec les représentants américains lors de la réunion annuelle du Comité ministériel Canada–États-Unis sur la défense commune, laquelle se tint cette année-là à Montebello, au Québec. Les discussions (documents 302, 586 et 587) tenues à cette occasion ne servirent qu'à faire ressortir les différences entre les évaluations américaine et canadienne de la situation. L'ambassadeur du Canada aux États-Unis, Arnold Heeney, déclara plus tard que la réunion de Montebello fut un point tournant majeur dans les relations canado-américaines pendant les années Diefenbaker.[2] Une tentative de médiation menée conjointement par le Canada, le Mexique et le Brésil fut rejetée fermement par Washington. En octobre, les Américains imposèrent un embargo sur les exportations vers Cuba. À La Havane, l'ambassadeur du Canada, Allan Anderson, fit part de ses « inquiétudes concernant le développement d'une situation où le Canada commençait à apparaître comme le « chouchou » tenu en haute estime par le gouvernement cubain ». Les appréhensions d'Anderson étaient bien fondées : en décembre 1960, le ressentiment américain envers les échanges commerciaux grandissants du Canada avec Cuba était élevé.

Comme le précisa Green dans l'avant-propos de son rapport annuel, malgré l'intensification des conflits Est-Ouest partout dans le monde, les événements survenus en 1960 « ne provoquèrent pas une reprise à grande échelle de la guerre froide. Les contacts avec le bloc soviétique, bien que réduits, ne furent pas coupés entièrement ». Les politiciens et les diplomates canadiens s'efforcèrent de garder les canaux de communication ouverts. Peu avant le sommet, le ministre du Commerce, Gordon Churchill, se rendit à Moscou pour signer une prolongation de l'accord commercial de 1955 avec l'URSS, et revint enchanté de l'accueil amical qu'on lui réserva (document 504). Même après l'échec de la conférence de Paris, l'ambassadeur Johnson eut des échanges cordiaux avec les dirigeants soviétiques (documents 505 et 506) au cours desquels il exprima l'espoir canadien d'un élargissement des relations

Eisenhower asked that Green discuss the matter with American officials at the annual meeting of the Canada-United States Ministerial Committee on Joint Defence, held that year in Montebello, Quebec. The discussions (Documents 302, 586, 587) served only to highlight the differences between American and Canadian appraisals of the situation. Arnold Heeney, Canada's ambassador to the United States, later identified the Montebello meeting as a crucial turning-point in Canada-US relations during the Diefenbaker years.[2] A joint attempt at mediation by Canada, Mexico and Brazil was firmly rejected by Washington. In October, the Americans imposed an embargo on exports to Cuba. From Havana, Canadian ambassador Allan Anderson expressed his "concern over [the] position gradually emerging in which Canada begins to appear as 'the fair haired boy' in high favour with [the] Cuban Government." Anderson's fears were well founded: by December 1960, American resentment of Canada's continued and growing trade with Cuba was high.

As Green pointed out in his foreword to the annual report, despite the intensification of East-West conflicts in all parts of the globe, events during 1960 "fell short of a full-scale revival of the cold war. Contacts with the Soviet bloc, though reduced, were not entirely abandoned." Canadian politicians and diplomats strove to keep channels of communication open. Shortly before the summit, Minister of Trade and Commerce Gordon Churchill travelled to Moscow to sign an extension of the 1955 trade agreement with the USSR, and reported in glowing terms on the friendly reception he received (Document 504). Even after the failure of the Paris conference, Ambassador Johnson had cordial conversations with Soviet leaders (Documents 505, 506), in which he expressed Canada's hope for expanded trade and cultural relations. The issue of Russian-born Canadian citizens who had returned to the USSR and been detained there against their wishes was at least partially resolved.

In a rather ironic contrast, Canada's relations with its chief Western ally, the United States, showed a marked deterioration during 1960. Bilateral political discussions between the two countries were dominated by the issue of nuclear weapons. In Canada, opinions on the matter differed sharply. Green, supported by Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs Norman Robertson, was opposed to the acquisition of nuclear weapons by Canadian forces, while Minister of National Defence George Pearkes and Clerk of the Privy Council Robert Bryce favoured continued close co-operation with the Americans on military matters. In January 1960, diametrically opposing arguments were presented by Bryce and by D. B. Dewar, also of the Privy Council Office. According to Bryce, "prompt action" should be taken, and would be welcomed by the Canadian public (Document 242). Dewar, on the other hand, argued that the country was "going through a period of uncertainty about its defence policy and programmes. This uncertainty has not perhaps reached the point where we could be said to have a crisis about defence policy, but there is not much likelihood that the problem will grow smaller in the coming months and commerciales et culturelles avec l'URSS. La question des citoyens canadiens nés en Russie puis revenus en URSS et détenus contre leur volonté fut au moins en partie réglée.

Contraste plutôt ironique, les relations du Canada avec son principal allié occidental, les États-Unis, se détériorèrent de façon notable en 1960. Les discussions politiques bilatérales entre les deux pays furent dominées par la question des armes nucléaires. Au Canada, les avis à ce sujet étaient très partagés. Green, soutenu par le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Norman Robertson, s'opposait à l'acquisition d'armes nucléaires par les forces canadiennes, tandis que le ministre de la Défense nationale, George Pearkes, et le greffier du Conseil privé, Robert Bryce, préconisaient le maintien d'une étroite coopération avec les Américains dans le domaine militaire. En janvier 1960, Bryce et D. B. Dewar, également du Conseil privé, avancèrent des arguments diamétralement opposés. Selon Bryce, « une action rapide » s'imposait et serait bien perçue des Canadiens (document 242). De son côté, Dewar tint les propos suivants : « ...le pays traverse une période d'incertitude quant à sa politique et à ses programmes de défense. Ce flottement n'est peut-être pas majeur au point de nous obliger à parler de crise dans la politique de défense, mais il est très peu probable que le problème aille en s'amenuisant dans les mois et les années à venir. Les doutes et les insatisfactions sont trop marqués pour disparaître rapidement, et les événements à venir pourraient même les amplifier ». Il fit valoir également que « des rédacteurs en chef, des enseignants, des étudiants et des citoyens de différents milieux » estimaient que le gouvernement avait accepté trop facilement « la politique de défense des États-Unis, qualifiée au mieux de stérile, et au pire de provocatrice » (document 304). Diefenbaker, malgré son mépris pour « ces illuminés aux cheveux longs qui prêchent contre la défense nucléaire » (document 110), partageait l'avis de Dewar quant à l'humeur du public. Le premier ministre déclara à Heeney que l'intensification du sentiment anti-américain au Canada l'inquiétait. Ses appréhensions firent l'objet de discussions avec des hauts responsables américains (documents 228-235).

Ces évaluations contradictoires ralentirent considérablement la négociation d'un accord sur le stockage de têtes nucléaires dans les bases occupées à bail par les Américains en territoire canadien. Le texte des notes autorisant la présence d'ogives sur les bases aériennes de Goose Bay et Harmon fut convenu officieusement en juillet. Cependant, l'ébauche de l'accord ne fut pas avalisée par le Cabinet en 1960, malgré l'affirmation catégorique de Pearkes selon qui il était « difficile de justifier tout autre retard » (document 254). Les négociations sur la dotation des forces canadiennes en armes nucléaires devinrent alors encore plus tortueuses. Le 18 janvier, une déclaration publique ambiguë du premier ministre déplut aux Américains, qui se dirent meme « vivement préoccupés » (document 265) par l'absence d'orientation claire dans la politique canadienne. En juin, Pearkes fit remarquer à Diefenbaker que le Canada se trouvait dans la « regrettable situation » de devoir payer pour des missiles BOMARC et Honest John qui coûtaient cher et de n'avoir aucun arrangement lui permettant de les armer avec les ogives nucléaires years. The doubts and dissatisfactions are too deep to be dispelled quickly and coming events may very well intensify them." He pointed to claims by "editors, teachers, students, and citizens at large" that the Canadian government had too easily accepted "a United States defence policy which is characterized as being sterile at best and provocative at worst" (Document 304). Diefenbaker, despite his contempt for impractical "long-hairs talking in favour of there being no nuclear defences" (Document 110), shared Dewar's assessment of the public mood. The Prime Minister expressed his concerns over growing anti-American sentiment in Canada to Heeney, and these concerns were passed on to and discussed with high American officials (Documents 228-235).

As a result of these contradictory assessments, progress on an agreement concerning the storage of nuclear warheads at leased American bases in Canada was painfully slow. The text of notes authorizing the presence of warheads at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Bases was unofficially agreed on in July. But the draft agreement was not endorsed by Cabinet during 1960, despite Pearkes' emphatic assertion that it was "difficult to justify any further delay" (Document 254). Negotiations on nuclear weapons for Canadian forces proved even more tortuous. An ambiguous public statement by the Prime Minister on January 18 left American authorities unsatisfied and indeed "deeply disturbed" (Document 265) by the lack of clear direction in Canadian policy. In June, Pearkes pointed out to Diefenbaker that Canada was being placed in the "unhappy position" (Document 270) of paying for expensive BOMARC and Honest John missiles without any arrangement being put in place to arm them with the required nuclear warheads. It was left to Bryce to finally spur the government into action late in the year. He orchestrated the drafting of a document that allowed Cabinet to authorize negotiations based on the principle of joint control of American nuclear weapons assigned to Canadian units. In late December, Douglas Harkness (who had replaced Pearkes as Minister of National Defence in October) circulated the text of a draft agreement (Document 277). At the same time, however, Green prevailed over his pro-nuclear colleagues when he secured Cabinet's permission for Canada's delegation to the United Nations General Assembly to vote in favour of an Irish resolution against the spread of nuclear weapons (Document 111). Most of the other members of NATO abstained on this vote, but Green wished to give clear proof of Canada's commitment to the cause of disarmament. It was stipulated that if no progress was made on disarmament in the near future, Canada might then acquire nuclear weapons.

Other items on the continental defence and security agenda were also marked by slow progress. In June, Canadian ministers grudgingly approved the staging of a NORAD exercise, Operation Sky Shield. This replaced Operation Sky Hawk, scuttled by Ottawa the previous year. Negotiations began to acquire American interceptor aircraft to replace the ageing CF-100. This issue was fraught with political problems stemming from the Diefenbaker government's controversial cancellation of the Avro Arrow in 1959. The details of a possible agreement finally began to emerge in June, involving the reciprocal purchase of Canadian CL-44 transport planes by the requises. Finalement, Bryce réussit à faire bouger le gouvernement plus tard dans l'année. Il orchestra la rédaction d'un document qui permit au Cabinet d'autoriser la tenue de négociations sur la base d'un contrôle conjoint des armes nucléaires américaines confiées à des unités canadiennes. À la fin décembre, Douglas Harkness (qui avait remplacé Pearkes comme ministre de la Défense nationale en octobre) fit circuler l'ébauche d'un accord (document 277). En même temps toutefois, Green l'emporta sur ses collègues pro-nucléaire quand il obtint du Cabinet la permission de donner à la délégation du Canada à l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies instruction de voter en faveur d'une résolution irlandaise contre la prolifération des armes nucléaires (document 111). La plupart des autres membres de l'OTAN s'abstinrent de voter sur cette résolution, mais Green voulut montrer clairement l'engagement du Canada envers le désarmement. Par ailleurs, il fut précisé que si aucun progrès n'était fait en matière de désarmement dans un proche avenir, le Canada pourrait alors acquérir des armes nucléaires.

D'autres éléments du programme de défense et de sécurité continentales avancèrent aussi à pas de tortue. En juin, les ministres canadiens approuvèrent à contrecœur la tenue d'un exercice du Commandement de la défense aérienne de l'Amérique du Nord, appelé Opération Sky Shield. Cet exercice remplaçait l'Opération Sky Hawk à laquelle Ottawa avait mis fin l'année précédente. Les négociations commencèrent en vue de l'acquisition de chasseurs d'interception américains pour remplacer les vieux CF-100. Ce dossier fut alourdi par de nombreux problèmes politiques découlant de la décision controversée du gouvernement Diefenbaker d'annuler le projet du chasseur Avro Arrow, en 1959. Les détails d'un éventuel accord commencèrent finalement à émerger en juin : les États-Unis achèteraient des avions de transport canadiens CL-44, en échange de quoi le Canada acquerrait 66 chasseurs à réaction américains F-101. Lors d'une rencontre avec Eisenhower en septembre, Diefenbaker pressa vivement les Américains d'accepter l'entente. Mais ces derniers la rejetèrent en décembre et suggérèrent plutôt de donner les F-101 au Canada, pourvu que celui-ci prenne à sa charge le réseau radar Pinetree.

Malgré ces débats parfois acrimonieux et des irritants comme la réglementation américaine sur la balance des paiements ainsi que la prédominance des périodiques américains sur le marché canadien, les relations économiques avec les États-Unis pendant l'année 1960 furent marquées, dans l'ensemble, par un esprit de bonne volonté. De retour d'une réunion du Comité canado-américain du commerce et des affaires économiques tenue à Washington en février, le ministre des Finances, Donald Fleming, fit état d'une discussion « franche et amicale », la « meilleure et la plus productive » (document 314) de toutes celles auxquelles il avait participé. La coopération entre les deux pays ne fut jamais aussi évidente que lors des négociations sur l'aménagement du fleuve Columbia. Des contraintes d'espace obligent ici à n'imprimer qu'une infime partie des volumineuses archives à ce sujet. Cependant, les documents du présent volume donnent un aperçu des principaux événements qui contribuèrent à dénouer l'impasse dans les négociations. En juin, le ministre de la

US in exchange for a Canadian purchase of 66 American F-101 fighter jets. During a meeting with Eisenhower in September, Diefenbaker strongly urged American acceptance of the deal. However, the US rejected it in December, suggesting instead that the F-101s be given to Canada in return for the Canadian takeover of the Pinetree radar network.

In contrast to these sometimes acrimonious debates, and in spite of irritants such as new US balance of payments regulations and the dominance of American periodicals in the Canadian market, economic relations with the US during 1960 were, on the whole, marked by a spirit of good will. Returning from the meeting of the Joint Canada-United States Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, held in Washington in February, Finance Minister Donald Fleming reported on a "frank and friendly" discussion that was "the best and most constructive" (Document 314) of all such meetings he had attended. In no area was Canadian-American co-operation more evident than in the negotiations over the development of the Columbia River. Space limitations allow for the printing of only a small fraction of the voluminous archival records on this subject. The documents in this volume provide an overview of the key events leading to a breakthrough in the formerly deadlocked negotiations. In June, Minister of Justice E. Davie Fulton reported that "no insuperable problem" (Document 344) remained; in September, a progress report was released, outlining the key elements of the treaty signed in January 1961. However, though federal government negotiators in both countries were satisfied, the government of British Columbia remained "consistently suspicious" (Document 351) of Ottawa's actions and intentions.

The Commonwealth remained a key area of Canadian concern during 1960. The prospect that the United Kingdom might join the European Economic Community was distinctly unwelcome to a Conservative government eager to maintain economic as well as emotional ties with the mother country. In June, Canadian officials requested "a firm assurance that the United Kingdom had not embarked on a changed policy and that there would continue to be very close consultation with Canada" (Document 389). After discussions between British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan and West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer in August, Ottawa was informed that a change in economic relations with Europe was being contemplated, since "[t]he United Kingdom must be economically strong if we are to be able to continue to play our full part in the economic development of the Commonwealth and in trying to maintain world stability." The British intended to "start from the assumption that there is broad agreement among Commonwealth countries that it will be desirable for the United Kingdom to enter into a form of closer association with Europe provided that certain essential requirements can be met" (Document 391). Ottawa's response was that "[t]he United Kingdom should not be left under any illusion that Canada could acquiesce in any arrangements which they make in Europe at the expense of Canada's trade" (Document 392).

Along with this determination to preserve ties with the "Old Commonwealth" went an equally strong, if not stronger, resolve to maintain good relations with the Justice, E. Davie Fulton, rapporta qu'« aucun problème insurmontable » (document 344) ne demeurait. En septembre, un rapport d'étape fut publié, exposant les grandes lignes du traité qui serait signé en janvier 1961. Cependant, même si les négociateurs des gouvernements fédéraux des deux pays se dirent satisfaits, le gouvernement de la Colombie-Britannique « continuait de se méfier » (document 351) des actions et des intentions d'Ottawa.

Le Commonwealth fut aussi une des grandes préoccupations du Canada tout au long de l'année 1960. La perspective que le Royaume-Uni puisse se joindre à la Communauté économique européenne était très mal vue par un gouvernement conservateur désirant à tout prix maintenir les liens économiques et émotifs avec la mère patrie. En juin, les responsables canadiens demandèrent « l'assurance ferme que le Royaume-Uni n'avait pas changé sa politique et que les consultations très étroites avec le Canada se poursuivraient » (document 389). Après les discussions tenues en août entre le premier ministre britannique Harold Macmillan et le chancelier ouest-allemand Konrad Adenauer, Ottawa fut informé qu'un changement dans les relations économiques avec l'Europe était envisagé, du fait que « le Royaume-Uni devait être solide sur le plan économique s'il entendait continuer de participer pleinement au développement économique du Commonwealth et à la stabilité du monde ». Pour les Britanniques, il fallait « partir de l'hypothèse que les pays du Commonwealth étaient généralement favorables à l'idée que le Royaume-Uni resserre ses liens avec l'Europe, pourvu que certaines conditions essentielles soient respectées » (document 391). À cela, Ottawa répondit que « le Royaume-Uni devait bien se garder de penser que le Canada souscrirait à tout arrangement avec l'Europe qui nuirait à ses intérêts commerciaux » (document 392).

Cette volonté de préserver les liens avec le « vieux Commonwealth » s'accompagna d'une détermination égale, sinon plus marquée, à maintenir de bonnes relations avec le « nouveau Commonwealth ». Dans ce contexte, l'Afrique du Sud, que des émeutes raciales et des actes de violence avaient secouée en début d'année, était au centre des préoccupations du Canada. En mars, George Glazebrook, de la Direction du Commonwealth, écrivit à ce sujet une note dont le but était « lancer discrètement l'idée que le Canada pourrait jouer un rôle politique très visible au sein du Commonwealth » (document 356). En effet, le Canada, suggéra Glazebrook, pourrait rendre service au Commonwealth en général et également, sur le long terme, à l'Afrique du Sud, en mettant la politique de l'apartheid à l'ordre du jour de la réunion des premiers ministres du Commonwealth en mai. Les pourparlers menés à Londres à ce sujet ne donnèrent rien, mais grâce en partie aux efforts de Diefenbaker, le communiqué publié à la fin de la réunion affirma que le Commonwealth était une association multiraciale. En juillet, Bryce signala l'inquiétude des responsables des pays asiatiques et africains du Commonwealth « devant la possibilité d'un schisme entre les « anciens » et les « nouveaux » membres du Commonwealth... sur la question... de l'Afrique du Sud ». Un de ces responsables estima « qu'il serait nettement préférable qu'au moins un des anciens pays membres à majorité blanche se

"New Commonwealth." The focus of Canadian concerns was South Africa, where race riots and violence occurred early in the year. George Glazebrook of the Commonwealth Division wrote a memo on the subject in March, intended "to hint delicately that there is room for an act of high statesmanship within the Commonwealth" by Canada (Document 356). Canada, Glazebrook suggested, could benefit both the Commonwealth as a whole and, in the long term, South Africa itself, by making the policy of apartheid a subject for discussion at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting in May. The talks in London were inconclusive, but thanks in part to Diefenbaker's efforts, the communiqué issued at the end of the meeting affirmed that the Commonwealth was a multi-racial association. In July, Bryce reported concern among officials of Asian and African Commonwealth countries "at the possibility of a split between the 'old' and the 'new' members ... over ... South Africa." One such official "thought it would be much better if there were at least one old white member on the black new side, and that this made Canada's position of particular importance" (Document 386).

As preparations for the 1961 Prime Ministers' meeting began in the fall of 1960, it became ever more evident that in order to maintain harmony with the "New Commonwealth," Canada might have to oppose the British policy of avoiding any discussion of member countries' internal politics. In November, Diefenbaker stated to Basil Robinson, his liaison with External Affairs, that without some concessions by the South African government on its racial policies, "he could not possibly ... adopt at the next meeting an attitude as tolerant of South Africa as he had before and during the last meeting" (Document 378). Diefenbaker accordingly notified Macmillan of his decision (Document 380). In response, Macmillan sent an impassioned letter, arguing that if South Africa were expelled from the Commonwealth, "[w]e should be condemning the country to further years of apartheid and ever-growing bitterness." Macmillan claimed that Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman Putra of Malaya, who was held in particularly high esteem by Diefenbaker, was "very much alive to the possibly disastrous effect on the whole Commonwealth structure of the beginning of a break-up now" and so would agree not to "force the issue, at any rate for the time being" (Document 382). From London, however, Canadian High Commissioner George Drew sent a different account of the Tunku's views (Document 383). The stage had thus been set for a clash between Canadian and British policies on this issue in 1961.

There were few changes in the Department's senior personnel at home and abroad during 1960. Howard Green and Norman Robertson remained in their posts throughout the year, as did Arnold Heeney in Washington, George Drew in London, Pierre Dupuy in Paris, Chester Ronning in New Delhi, Escott Reid in Bonn, Jules Léger at NATO headquarters in Paris, and Charles Ritchie at the United Nations. David Johnson left Moscow in November, and was replaced by Arnold Smith in January 1961. In Ottawa, George Glazebrook and George Ignatieff joined A. E. Ritchie and E. W. T. Gill as assistant under-secretaries. Marcel Cadieux was appointed deputy under-secretary, a post left vacant by the departure of R. M.

retrouve du côté des nouveaux pays membres à majorité noire, et que cela rendait la position du Canada particulièrement importante » (document 386).

Les préparatifs de la réunion des premiers ministres de 1961 s'amorcèrent à l'automne 1960. Il devint alors encore plus évident que pour maintenir l'harmonie au sein du « nouveau Commonwealth », le Canada pourrait devoir s'opposer à la politique britannique voulant qu'on évite toute discussion sur les affaires internes d'un pays membre. En novembre, Diefenbaker déclara à Basil Robinson, son agent de liaison aux Affaires extérieures, que si l'Afrique du Sud ne donnait pas un peu de lest dans ses politiques raciales, « il ne pourrait pas... adopter à la prochaine réunion une attitude aussi tolérante qu'avant et pendant la dernière » (document 378). Diefenbaker avisa Macmillan en conséquence (document 380). Dans sa lettre en réponse, ce dernier livra un vibrant plaidoyer, faisant valoir que si l'Afrique du Sud était expulsée du Commonwealth, « nous la condamnerons à de nombreuses autres années d'apartheid et à une rancœur qui ira s'amplifiant ». Macmillan affirma que le premier ministre de la Malaisie, Tunku Abdul Rahman Putra, tenu en assez haute estime par Diefenbaker, était « très conscient des incidences désastreuses que tout signe de rupture, maintenant, pourrait avoir sur la structure globale du Commonwealth » et qu'il était d'accord « pour ne pas insister sur la question, du moins pour le moment » (document 382). De Londres cependant, le haut-commissaire du Canada, George Drew, donna un tout autre son de cloche quant aux vues de Tunku (document 383). La table était donc mise pour un heurt entre les politiques canadienne et britannique sur cette question en 1961.

L'année 1960 fut marquée par peu de changements au niveau de la haute direction du Ministère, au pays et à l'étranger. Howard Green et Norman Robertson restèrent en poste pendant toute l'année, tout comme Arnold Heeney à Washington, George Drew à Londres, Pierre Dupuy à Paris, Chester Ronning à New Delhi, Escott Reid à Bonn, Jules Léger au siège de l'OTAN à Paris, et Charles Ritchie aux Nations Unies. David Johnson quitta Moscou en novembre et fut remplacé par Arnold Smith en janvier 1961. À Ottawa, George Glazebrook et George Ignatieff se joignirent à A. E. Ritchie et E. W. T. Gill à titre de sous-secrétaires adjoints. Marcel Cadieux fut nommé sous-secrétaire suppléant, un poste devenu vacant avec le départ de R. M. Macdonnell en 1959. John Holmes quitta le ministère des Affaires extérieures à la fin de l'année. Au Cabinet, George Hees remplaça Gordon Churchill en tant que ministre du Commerce, tandis que Douglas Harkness succéda à George Pearkes comme ministre de la Défense nationale. Ces deux nominations furent faites en octobre 1960. Ellen Fairclough et Donald Fleming conservèrent leurs portefeuilles en tant que ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration et ministre des Finances.

La plupart des documents reproduits dans le présent volume proviennent des archives du ministère des Affaires extérieures et des dossiers personnels du premier ministre Diefenbaker, qui sont conservés au Diefenbaker Canada Centre, à Saskatoon. Les autres sont tirés des dossiers du Bureau du Conseil privé, du ministère des Finances, du ministère du Commerce, du ministère de la Citoyenneté et de Macdonnell in 1959. John Holmes left the Department of External Affairs at the end of the year. At the Cabinet level, George Hees replaced Gordon Churchill as Minister of Trade and Commerce, while Douglas Harkness took up the post of Minister of National Defence in place of George Pearkes. Both these appointments were made in October 1960. Ellen Fairclough and Donald Fleming retained their portfolios as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and Minister of Finance.

Documents in this volume were selected primarily from the records of the Department of External Affairs and the personal files of Prime Minister Diefenbaker, held at the Diefenbaker Canada Centre in Saskatoon. Additional documents were chosen from the files of the Privy Council Office, the Department of Finance, the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, as well as from the private papers of Cabinet ministers and senior government officials. In preparing the volume, researchers were given unrestricted access to the files of the Department of External Affairs and generous access to other collections. A complete list of the archival sources consulted to prepare this volume is found on page xxix.

The selection of documents for Volume 27 has been guided by the general principles outlined in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), as amended in the Introduction to Volume 20 (p. xxiii). The series continues to attempt to provide a self-contained record of the major foreign policy decisions taken by the Government of Canada, by concentrating on Canada's most important bilateral and multilateral relationships and on the major international issues that directly involved Cabinet members and senior bureaucrats in substantive policy decisions. Some passages and names have been omitted in accordance with the provisions of the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act. These deletions are indicated in the documents.

The editorial apparatus employed in this volume remains identical to that described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (†) indicates a document that is not printed. Editorial excisions are shown by an ellipsis (...). The phrase "group corrupt" indicates decryption problems in the transmission of the original telegram. Words and passages that were struck out by the author, marginal notes, and distribution lists are reproduced as footnotes only when important. Unless otherwise indicated, it is assumed that documents have been read by the intended recipient. Proper and place names are standardized. The editor has silently corrected spelling, capitalization, and punctuation. All other editorial additions to the documents are indicated by the use of square brackets. Documents are reprinted in either English or French, depending on their original language.

In carrying out the research for this volume, I had the able assistance of Jennifer Anderson, Alexandra Clark, Dr. John Clearwater, Virginia Miller, and Dr. Jeff Noakes. Dr. Michael Stevenson did a substantial part of the editorial work for Chapter III, and prepared the index. As always, staff at Library and Archives Canada gave invaluable help and advice, as did Rob Paul at the Diefenbaker Centre. Ciuineas Boyle and Herb Barrett facilitated access to Privy Council Office records. Aline Gélineau typed and formatted the manuscript with her usual efficiency and attention l'Immigration ainsi que des archives privées des ministres du Cabinet et des hauts fonctionnaires. Pour la préparation du présent volume, les chercheurs ont eu libre accès aux dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et un accès généreux à ceux des autres collections. La liste complète des documents consultés pour la préparation du présent volume figure à la page xxix.

Le choix des documents du volume 27 s'inspire des principes généraux énoncés dans l'introduction du volume 7 (pp. ix-ix), et modifiés dans l'introduction du volume 20 (p. xxiii). Les volumes de cette série visent à rendre compte, dans une même collection, des grandes décisions prises par le gouvernement du Canada en matière de politique étrangère, en mettant l'accent sur les relations bilatérales et multilatérales les plus importantes ainsi que sur les grands dossiers de la politique internationale à l'égard desquels les membres du Cabinet et les hauts responsables ont été amenés à prendre des décisions de fond. Certains passages et noms ont été omis de façon à respecter les dispositions de la Loi sur l'accès à l'information et de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels. Ces suppressions sont signalées dans le texte.

Les signes typographiques sont les mêmes que ceux décrits dans l'introduction du volume 9 (p. xix). Une croix (†) indique un document qui n'est pas imprimé. Les suppressions éditoriales sont signalées par une ellipse (...). L'expression « groupe corrompu » signale des problèmes de décryptage dans la transmission du télégramme original. Les mots et passages barrés par l'auteur, les notes dans la marge et les listes de destinataires sont indiqués en bas de page uniquement quand ils sont importants. Sauf indication contraire, on tient pour acquis que les documents ont été lus par leur destinataire. Les noms propres et le nom des lieux ont été uniformisés. Le rédacteur a corrigé les fautes d'orthographe, de majuscule et de ponctuation. Tous les autres ajouts rédactionnels sont indiqués par des crochets. Les documents sont reproduits en anglais ou en français, selon la langue originale.

Jennifer Anderson, Alexandra Clark, John Clearwater, Virginia Miller et Jeff Noakes ont facilité grandement mes recherches pour ce volume. Michael Stevenson a fait une bonne partie du travail de révision pour le Chapitre III et a préparé l'index. Comme toujours, l'aide et les conseils prodigués par le personnel de Bibliothèque et Archives Canada ont été extrêmement précieux. Ce fut le cas aussi pour Rob Paul du Diefenbaker Canada Centre. Ciuineas Boyle et Herb Barrett ont facilité l'accès aux archives du Bureau du Conseil privé. Le manuscrit a été tapé et mis en forme par Aline Gélineau, avec son efficacité et sa minutie habituelles. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin s'est chargée de la relecture de l'ensemble du manuscrit et a dressé la liste des personnes, avec l'aide de Christopher Cook. Le service du Bureau de la traduction d'Affaires étrangères et Commerce international Canada a produit le texte français des notes de bas de page, des légendes et autres textes complémentaires.

Greg Donaghy, le rédacteur en chef de la série, a lu l'ensemble du manuscrit et a formulé de nombreux commentaires constructifs. Mes autres collègues de la Section historique, Hector Mackenzie et Mary Halloran, ont tous deux apporté leur concours to detail. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin produced the list of persons and proofread the volume, with the assistance of Christopher Cook. The Translation Bureau at Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada provided the French versions of footnotes and other ancillary texts.

Dr. Greg Donaghy, the general editor of the series, read the manuscript in its entirety, and offered many constructive suggestions. My other colleagues in the Historical Section, Dr. Hector Mackenzie and Mary Halloran, provided support and advice. The series would not be possible without the support of Ariel Delouya, the director of the Policy Research Divison. I remain solely responsible for the final selection of documents.

Finally, I would like to thank my son, Ben Cavell, for his humour and positive attitude during a year that we will both remember.

et fourni des conseils. Enfin, la publication de cette série ne serait pas possible sans le soutien d'Ariel Delouya, directeur de la Recherche sur les politiques. La responsabilité du choix des documents m'incombe entièrement.

Enfin, je voudrais remercier mon fils, Ben Cavell, pour son humour et son attitude positive pendant cette année dont nous allons tous deux nous souvenir.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY. [Ottawa], July 12, 1960

POLITICAL SITUATION IN THE CONGO

A grave development in the Congo situation occurred last night when Premier Moise Tshombe of Katanga Province declared the province to be "totally independent." He had previously declared a state of emergency.

Up to the present the disturbances in the Congo have been of an unexpected kind, i.e., a widespread mutiny of Congolese units of the Force Publique against their Belgian officers and against Europeans generally. What had been expected was disorders between the many strong tribal elements within the country and between tribal authorities and the new central government. It had been feared, moreover, that the central government, even with the backing of a loyal Force Publique, might be unable to maintain order. This pattern has been largely absent, however, until the present.

The Katanga revolt raises several new and disturbing elements. The province contains almost the whole of the Congo's potential wealth and natural resources, is the most highly industrialized, and is the location of the most important outside investment. Without the Katanga all possibility that the Congo might be a unified and economically viable state would disappear. The area is coveted by its white neighbours in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland whose rich copper belt adjoins. A few weeks ago Prime Minister Sir Roy Welensky caused considerable trouble by announcing that if the Congo were to break up the Rhodesias might find it necessary to take over the Katanga. He was probably rapped over the knuckles by Whitehall for this statement, but even since the disorders in the Congo broke out he has said that the Federation could only consider intervention in Katanga if its assistance were requested by the proper authorities. We know that this too caused great embarrassment to the United Kingdom Government, which may well have felt that its hands were tied in the whole issue as a result.[1] In any event when Tshombe requested assistance from the Federation a few days ago, the United Kingdom Government replied that such a request from a provincial government could not be entertained. Northern Rhodesian troops are, nonetheless, reported to be moving up to the border, ostensibly to protect European refugees.

The revolt of the Katanga raises other international complications. Elizabethville, the provincial capital, was the scene of serious mutiny in the Congolese security forces, and Belgian paratroopers had to be sent (as they were elsewhere) to raise a siege on Belgian officers and other white residents, virtually taking over control of Elizabethville in the process. It was this fact which undoubtedly encouraged Tshombe to make his declaration of independence. There will be a temptation for Belgian business and financial interests to put pressure on their government to ally itself openly with Tshombe. Whether this happens or not the revolt in fact creates a situation of civil war in which there will be strong pressures on European powers to take sides. This might lead to the fall of the Lumumba Government with no alternative national leadership in sight.

We should not lose sight of the fact that during the disorders the central government had done its best to contain the mutiny, to protect Europeans, and to restore normal conditions. This objective, moreover, seems to have been achieved in Leopoldville. The central government has given no indication of not wishing to maintain close and friendly relations with Belgium, and has appealed to Belgian technicians to remain in the country.

CONGO: ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The Secretary-General of the United Nations is taking steps to implement the Security Council resolution of July 14.[2] To meet the requirements of the situation in the Congo the Secretary-General is following a three-point programme as follows:

(a) A relatively long-term programme of technical assistance to the Congo which in its early stages will involve administrative assistance to the Congolese authorities in re-organizing their internal security forces, which have been disrupted by mutiny and by the removal of Belgian officers. This programme calls for an immediate though temporary secondment of military officers, now serving with the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization in Palestine.

(b) A short-term, stopgap arrangement for meeting the emergency situation in the Congo, through the establishment of a United Nations military force, composed of contingents drawn mainly from French-speaking African states. This Force, expected to number about 2,500, will be used to restore order and protect property and lives. It will be an international military force on the UNEF model and General Von Horn, the Chief of Staff of UNTSO has been appointed Commander. The operations of the Force will be governed by principles established for UNEF, such as shooting only in self-defence, not becoming involved in internal political conflicts, and having a balanced composition reflecting the political circumstances of its establishment.

(c) An emergency programme of supply to meet an acute food shortage in the Leopoldville area. The Secretary-General is appealing to member states of the United Nations to offer foodstuffs on a gift basis. There is a related question of providing transportation, presumably by air, for the food supplies offered.

Secondment of UNTSO Officers

2. The Secretary-General has asked General Von Horn to recommend military officers who can be spared from UNTSO duties in Palestine. The main qualification is that they should be French-speaking. These officers will serve in civilian dress in the Congo as technical advisers to the Congolese authorities responsible for internal security. The Secretary-General has now requested that 5 Canadian officers, who have volunteered to serve in the Congo, be permitted to be seconded. The Government has already approved the secondment of three of these officers (Lt-Col. Berthiaume, Major King and Major George). These officers are to fly on July 16 with General Von Horn to arrive in Leopoldville on July 17. They are part of the advance party which consists as well of Danish, Norwegian and Swedish officers of UNTSO and some United Nations Field Service personnel.

3. On arrival they will assist General Von Horn in establishing a headquarters for the United Nations Force and arranging liaison with the appropriate Congolese authorities. They will no doubt be required to assist in arrangements for the arrival of national contingents of the Force.

4. The secondment of two other Canadian officers, Major J. Clarke and Major C. McLean, has been requested with a view to their being called forward by General Von Horn in the near future. The approval of the Government is required for their secondment.

Supply of Foodstuffs

5. The Canadian Permanent Mission in New York has received a formal request from the Secretary-General for foodstuffs. The United Nations has received reports regarding the food situation in and around Leopoldville which indicated that, owing to a breakdown of the distribution system and other circumstances, a food shortage is likely to develop within the next few days. The Congolese Government has appealed to the Secretary-General to take immediate steps in order to provide assistance on an emergency basis. The Secretary-General has appealed to the Governments of United States, Soviet Union, Italy, India, Denmark, France and Canada to put at the disposal of the United Nations foodstuffs which are easily transportable and which might serve to gain the necessary time for the re-establishment of normal supplies. The expectation is that food and its transportation would be provided on a gift basis.

6. The Secretary-General would appreciate any indication concerning the possibility of providing air transportation for the foodstuffs. The United Nations contemplates establishing a staging area in Naples, from where the organization would hope to be able to take care of the transportation. The food supplies would be put at the disposal of the Congolese authorities with Dr. Ralph Bunche, in control of the U.N. side of the operation in Leopoldville.

7. Available for an emergency gift of this kind in Canada are the following commodities: canned pork, wheat/flour and whole milk powder. It is estimated that each North Star aircraft could carry 9,000 lbs. of any of these commodities. The United States is contributing 300 tons of flour which will be flown in immediately in 21 United States aircraft. The United Kingdom will supply the value of £10,000 in foodstuffs which will also be airlifted. A contribution of the Canadian commodities which could be carried in 5 North Star aircraft might constitute a comparable gift of foodstuffs from Canada. In view of the United States gift of flour, Canada might make its contribution in canned pork and whole milk powder, say 20,000 lbs. of each. Supplies of this scale would readily be available.

Communications and Logistics Specialists for the U.N. Force

8. The Secretary-General has been made fully aware that the Government of Canada did not wish any expectation to be aroused that military assistance from Canada would be forthcoming. Nevertheless, the Secretary-General has addressed to the Canadian Government an enquiry, the text of which is attached.† It has to do with the provision of certain specialized personnel for the U.N. Force.

9. The indications are that the national contingents will be provided by Tunisia, Morocco, Ghana and possibly Guinea and Mali. These would be the troops actually engaged in maintaining order and protecting property and lives. The United Nations is faced with the problem of providing adequate communication and logistic support for the Force. The specialists required by the United Nations would be purely technical and non-combatant. They would be serving the purposes of the U.N. Force in Congo but as well they would provide the communications and logistics needs of the other United Nations agencies in the Congo operation.

10. Any request for communications and logistics specialists is outside the scope of those which the Government has announced that it was prepared to consider. Nevertheless, there will be the formidable problem of administering the U.N. Force and many of the smaller states, especially those in Africa, do not have the experience necessary for giving administrative support to a mixed Force. The language problem in the Congo also poses a serious problem, perhaps even more so than the one which faced UNEF in Gaza. In line with his enquiry to Canada, the Secretary-General is approaching Sweden and Norway about the provision of aircraft and pilots for the purpose of aerial reconnaissance and communication.

11. Any white troops involved in the role proposed for the U.N. Force in the Congo will be in a difficult situation, since it may not be easy to persuade the Congolese people that the U.N. Force [is] not another form of foreign domination. The administrative units of the Force would not be required to coerce the Congolese in any way but those whose duties brought them in contact with the people might have to protect themselves and their equipment.

12. I would welcome the views of Cabinet on the response which might be given to the two requests (paras. 4 and 5) and to the enquiry (para. 8) made by the United Nations Secretary-General.[3]

Note pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum for Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 15, 1960

CONGO

The long-range problems involved in the future of the Congo may be more serious and more difficult to resolve than the short-range ones of restoring peace and order which have now been assumed by the United Nations.

2. Prime Minister Lumumba has broken off diplomatic relations with Belgium, claiming Belgium violated the Convention signed on June 29, by sending troops into the Congo without the Congolese having requested them. It is reported that Belgium interprets the Security Council resolution to mean that regular troops will be withdrawn to the Belgian bases in the Congo. The Congolese and other African nations will almost certainly interpret the resolution to mean a complete withdrawal from the Congo of all Belgian troops.

3. The Belgians believe that the troubles are Communist inspired and that if Lumumba and Kasavubu are maintained in power this will constitute a victory for the Communists. The United States also see Communist inspiration behind the troubles. While they do not constitute proof of Communist inspiration, Khrushchev's latest threats[4] are certainly proof of the reality of Communist involvement now.

4. Belgium seems to be dangerously willing to accept or even to encourage the secession of Katanga. Tshombe, the Prime Minister of Katanga, has stated that he will deny entry to the U.N. force (this is a separate and difficult problem). Tshombe has now requested free world recognition of an independent Katanga and we are faced with one more difficult problem. If any Western power (particularly Belgium) were to accord recognition, the results could be grave in the extreme.

5. Apart from these immediate dangers Katanga's withdrawal from the Congo might start a movement for further balkanization. In any event the Congo's economic future would be precarious without its richest province. The cause of those wishing to re-establish the historic kingdom of Bakongo which included most of what is now the Republic of Congo in the French Community, parts of Portuguese Angola and Northern Rhodesia, would be encouraged.

6. Even if Katanga should be reincorporated within the central republic there would still be an immense long-range problem of how the country can be administered until the Congolese can take over. This at the most optimistic estimate would be several years. Before the disorders there were approximately 10,000 Belgian administrators in the Congo. Unless the large majority consent to remain or return, which is highly improbable, or unless they can be replaced, the whole structure of the country could collapse. This would mean an operation of a magnitude which the United Nations is not at the moment even remotely equipped to face. It would be a monumental task to find 5,000 to 10,000 suitably trained and readily available personnel (and who in addition should be French speaking): United Nations technical assistance has been in terms of dozens, not thousands, of experts per country. The cost would be astronomical and many governments — even if agreeing in principle with the necessity of providing aid of such magnitude — might well balk at paying the price.

[4] Voir/See Seymour Topping, "Russians Demand Troops Quit Congo," New York Times, July 14, 1960, p. 5.

7. The agreement by independent African states to provide troops for the United Nations force will seriously tax their resources. They might be hard put to maintain their internal security should disorder break out with the risk of serious internal or even international repercussions.

8. The present state of the Congo and what happens to it in the future will be of immense importance to other already independent states in Africa, which seem at present to be showing a surprising and desirable sense of responsibility for events in that country. It will have an even greater effect on the plans and the timetables for the independence of still dependent territories in Africa. Ghana's almost over-readiness to move in with troops and advisers may be an indication of Nkrumah's hope that this will provide an opportunity for him to fulfil his much desired ambitions of leading a federation of African states. If he makes this plain it will obviously arouse jealousies and suspicions in the minds of other African governments. On the other hand, Europeans in South African, Portuguese Angola and Mozambique, the Rhodesias and Kenya must all be saying self-righteously "we told you so."

9. This memorandum has been designed to point out the scale of problem presented by the Congo situation, and not to explore solutions. It is perhaps evident, however, that the search for both immediate and long-term solutions is of the greatest urgency.

CONGO: ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS

This memorandum contains supplementary information concerning United Nations appeals for specialists to provide administrative services for the United Nations Force in the Congo. The Cabinet may wish to have this information in considering the Secretary-General's enquiry to Canada concerning the United Nations need for personnel and equipment for signal and also for parts of the logistic support for the Force (paras. 8 – 11 of the Cabinet memorandum of July 15 and its enclosure). On July 18 the Secretary-General enquired urgently of the Permanent Representative of Canada to the United Nations whether a reply in principle on his earlier enquiry would be forthcoming.

2. The need for signals personnel for the Force is most urgent and in response to a query from the Department of External Affairs the United Nations Secretariat has asked General Von Horn, now in Leopoldville, for an urgent assessment of his probable needs as regards signalling personnel and equipment. In the meantime, the Secretary-General has turned to Tunisia for assistance in this regard but has learned that the Tunisians can supply only a small signals unit which would be quite inadequate for the Force. The Secretary-General is anxious to have a Canadian reply in principle, notwithstanding the absence of a detailed request, because he wishes to know whether he should approach other countries in order to obtain the necessary complement of signals personnel with equipment.

3. The Secretary-General has approached other member states for specialist support as follows:

(a) Norway - The Norwegian Government has agreed to provide two Otter aircraft and 15 pilots and mechanics for aerial reconnaissance and communications.

(b) Sweden - In response to a similar request the Swedish Government will provide 14 light aircraft and 10 pilots and mechanics.

(c) Yugoslavia – Similarly the Yugoslav Government has agreed in principle to provide light aircraft, pilots and mechanics.

(d) United Arab Republic – It has been requested to provide vehicle maintenance personnel but has not replied partly because no details of the request have been made available.

4. As part of the further build-up of the Force, the Secretary-General has asked for one battalion each from Sweden, Yugoslavia and Ireland to be added to the African contingents already in the Congo. The United Nations has also made a request to Burma and Haiti, probably for contingents smaller than a battalion. Presumably the Secretary-General has moved from the first phase of building up the Force from Africa to a second phase involving non-Africans. It appears, however, that he is not making requests to NATO Powers for combat troops.

5. The Permanent Mission confirmed that the Acting Commander of the Force (Major-General Alexander) had received a note from Prime Minister Lumumba to the effect that, if the Belgian troops in the Congo were not withdrawn in three days, Lumumba would appeal to the Soviet Union for troops. This ultimatum has been sharply rejected by Dr. Bunche, who informed Lumumba that the United Nations did not receive ultimatums from member states. Apparently the Congolese Senate has criticized the Prime Minister for his action which was considered an irresponsible flirtation with the Soviet Union.

6. The situation in the Congo is by no means under control yet. On July 18 there were press reports about a clash with casualties between Moroccan troops and Congolese mutineers. However, the United Nations Force has had some success in quelling disturbances.

Airlift from Pisa to Leopoldville

7. The United Nations is having difficulty in finding aircraft for transporting supplies for the Force and other U.N. agencies operating in the Congo. A staging area has been established at Pisa, Italy. The problem is to shuttle supplies from Pisa to Leopoldville. The Secretary-General has been unable as yet to decide on the needed frequency of supply flights and he has asked the Commander for an appreciation. As an initial step, however, and before alternative arrangements are made, the United Nations will try to airlift 50,000 lbs. of freight per day. The Secretary-General has formally asked whether he could have an indication as to whether and to what extent the Government of Canada might find it possible to provide any assistance in this field.

8. I would welcome the views of Cabinet on the response which might be given to the Secretary-General as regards the matters raised in this memorandum.

CONGO: APPEAL FOR AIR TRANSPORT

We have obtained from the UN Secretariat some further details concerning the Secretary-General's request for assistance in air lifting supplies for the UN force in Congo from Pisa to Leopoldville.

2. Only Italy and Canada were asked for this particular assistance. The Italians have not repeat not yet replied but on the assumption that the burden is equally shared the Secretariat is asking if we can provide enough North Star aircraft to put down in Leopoldville about twenty-five thousand pounds of freight per day for a thirty day period. This would presumably mean flying two aircraft per day from Pisa to Leopoldville. The thirty day period is the Secretariat's present estimate of the time required before a seagoing supply line can be established.

3. We should emphasize: (a) that the supplies to be airlifted are for the UN Force in the Congo (not repeat not for the Congolese population as was the case with the previous appeal for foodstuffs); and (b) that this air lift (in contrast again to the air lift for the foodstuff) will be on a reimbursable basis, as are all the other services provided for the UN Force.

CONVERSATION WITH THE BELGIAN AMBASSADOR CONCERNING THE SITUATION IN THE CONGO

The Belgian Ambassador called on me by appointment this afternoon at 3.30 to discuss a message which he had just received from his Government. As the message was dated July 15 in large part it may have been superseded by subsequent developments.

2. The Belgian Ambassador stressed the general point that we are facing in the Congo an East-West struggle and in particular a Soviet attempt to take over. The Belgian officials who were alone in a position to administer the country and the officer personnel who could have turned the armed forces into an effective instrument to maintain order, have now been largely eliminated. There is a danger of a total collapse of the whole structure of Government and of a Communist take-over unless the United States and other friendly countries adopt publicly a firm position.

3. I said that we were concerned about the situation and alive to the possibilities of a Soviet coup. This was a most important point and any specific and detailed information which the Belgian Government could give us on a Communist infiltration would be very helpful. We appreciated that in many cases such infiltration was not overt and might be very difficult to document. I added I had witnessed, myself, in Indochina a Communist take-over and that for a while it seemed to me that the local French authorities had been greatly upset. There was a psychological shock involved in transfers of authority but I was sure that the Belgian authorities were taking this into account in making their assessment.

4. In the course of the conversation the Belgian Ambassador made three specific points:

(1) Cooperation between Belgium and U.N. forces.

The Belgian Government hope that U.N. forces will not intervene in regions which have remained peaceful or where Belgian troops are in effective control. I said that it seemed to me that the Secretary-General had this problem very much in mind but that it might be unwise to attempt to define too precisely just how far the UN troops should go in taking over from the Belgian units. It would be difficult to find legal justification for the presence of Belgian troops outside their treaty bases once peace and order had been restored and UN forces were in a position to take over.

The Belgian Ambassador said that his Government are of the opinion, that as a matter of priority, UN forces should attempt to restore order in the lower Congo and to liberate European nationals who are now being held prisoners. They should also restore port facilities in Matadi as such facilities are closely linked with the orderly flow of supplies into Leopoldville.

The Belgian authorities hope that UN forces will not intervene in the internal affairs of the Congo and, in particular, will not be despatched to Katanga. I said that from reports received from New York that the Secretary-General was very conscious of the difficulties in this regard. I raised the question whether it was not better to leave matters in the hands of the Secretary-General who seemed to have adopted a practical approach to achieve immediate results in the hope that theoretical issues could be settled later.

(2) As to Katanga, the Belgian Ambassador reported that his Government are anxious to avoid intervention in the internal affairs of that region. They have all along stressed the advantages of unity and maintained that the Congo as a whole is not viable without the resources of Katanga. They wish, however, to draw attention to the fact that order has now returned in Katanga and that there is, in that area, effective local government; the Katanga represents a stronghold of order in an area which is becoming increasingly disorganized. In spite of this, the Belgian Government hesitate very much to extend recognition as requested by the authorities of Katanga because of the danger of war which this would involve with the Congo, but they hope that other countries will extend such support as they can to that part of the Congo.

(3) As to the general situation in the Congo, the Belgian Government point out that, at least for the present, the normal process of government has been replaced by emergency decisions made by political agitators who are without contact with each other and with their constituents. For instance, the decision to break off diplomatic relations with Belgium was made by the Prime Minister who had not informed even his Foreign Minister! In the present circumstances, it seems that, in the lower Congo, the Government is unable to perform even the elementary tasks of Government. The policy of the Belgian Government, and one which they hope friendly governments will also adopt, is to encourage moderate elements so that, in due course, the situation may be stabilized.

5. The Belgian Ambassador expressed the hope that I would draw the above points to the attention of the Canadian authorities concerned and that they would bear them in mind whenever they had an opportunity to take action in relation to the Congo.[5]

CONGO; ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS
(Previous reference July 19)

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs had a memorandum circulated on the use of R.C.A.F. North Stars within the Congo.† He said that the Assistant Trade Commissioner in the Congo had reported that the assistance of R.C.A.F. aircraft for a few days in moving food supplies into and within the Congo would be invaluable. Mr. Maurice Pate, in charge of the United Nations food distribution, had asked whether R.C.A.F. aircraft could be sent for unloading at points in the Congo other than Leopoldville.

This latest request should be related to the Secretary-General's request set forth in a memorandum to Cabinet of July 20th,† also circulated, concerning the proposed airlift from Pisa to Leopoldville, because it was understood that the same four North Star aircraft would be involved in both requests. The arrangements for this airlift would last for 30 days. In so far as the cost of the operation was concerned, the United Nations intended that they should be entirely reimbursed.

Seen by the minister 21/7/60. [Ross Campbell]

He then referred to a further memorandum of July 20th,† which was circulated, with respect to signals specialists for the United Nations Force. There was an urgent need for such personnel for the U.N. Force in the Congo. The African countries, who were supplying military units, were unable to supply adequate signals components. The Commander of the U.N.E.F., in reply to an enquiry on the hope of seconding temporarily to the Force in the Congo a small detachment of Canadian signallers, who might serve as an advance party in setting up a communications system within the Force in Congo, had replied that he could not spare any personnel from the Canadian signals squadron with U.N.E.F. The United Nations Secretariat had suggested that the Force in the Congo might require a signal squadron of about 150 all ranks. The problems of communication would be different to those now faced by U.N.E.F., and equipment requirements would also be different.

The Minister recommended that the Cabinet approve the provision of the necessary aircraft, crews and maintenance personnel to support 4 active North Stars to transport supplies and equipment for the United Nations Force to and within the Congo and also for the shuttle airlift from Pisa to Leopoldville. He also recommended that the request of the United Nations for Canadian signals personnel with appropriate equipment be made available as soon as the troops had been immunized against tropical diseases.

5. The Minister of National Defence reported that a Canadian Officer was at the moment in New York discussing with U.N. personnel the arrangements to provide Canadian signal specialists for the U.N. Force in the Congo. He pointed out that the cost of the necessary equipment would be approximately $1 million. It might be possible to reduce the equipment required after further consultations. Since he anticipated that the Congo operation might last for a long time, he was anxious to obtain authority to replace the equipment in Canada at once. In answer to a question, he said that there was no advance party ready to proceed to the Congo at once from Canada, since it would take between three and four weeks to immunize the personnel against tropical diseases. He noted that the note which he had just been handed referred to the probable necessity of sending approximately 200 men to establish supply depots in the Congo. These men would probably have to be supplied by the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps. Together with the signals personnel, the total Canadian Force in the Congo within the next three or four weeks might number 500. It would be necessary to begin immunization that day and to cancel the leave of the troops who were to take leave in August. This, of course, would leak at once to the public. It would, therefore, seem appropriate to make a statement in the House that day.

6. During the discussion the following points were brought out:

(a) A senior Air Force Officer should be instructed to discuss with Mr. Pate, in charge of the United Nations food distribution in the Congo, the arrangements regarding the use of R.C.A.F. North Stars.

(b) The Secretary-General of the United Nations should be informed that since it would take at least three weeks to immunize military personnel in Canada against tropical diseases, he might wish to consider allowing an advance party of Canadian signallers from U.N.E.F. to proceed to the Congo to set up a communications system. After the period of immunization, the Cabinet could decide, in the light of the circumstances, whether additional Canadian personnel should in fact be sent to the Congo.

(c) The present plans should be limited to the provision of signals personnel only, but there was no reason why the personnel for the supply depots should not also be immunized.

7. The Cabinet,

(a) approved the provision of the necessary aircraft, crews and maintenance personnel to support four active North Stars to transport supplies and equipment for the United Nations

Force (1) to and within the Congo (2) for the shuttle airlift from Pisa to Leopoldville; it being understood that a senior Royal Canadian Air Force Officer would discuss the necessary arrangements with Mr. Maurice Pate, in charge of the United Nations food distribution; and,

(b) agreed,

(i) that the United Nations Secretary-General be informed that, since it would take at least three weeks to immunize signals specialists in Canada against tropical diseases he might wish to consider allowing a small group of Canadian signallers from U.N.E.F. to serve as an advance party to set up a communication system within the U.N. Force in the Congo; and,

(ii) that the necessary signal, logistic and administrative personnel of the Canadian Army be immunized against tropical diseases to meet the requirement that would arise should it be decided to establish signal and logistic units in the Congo.

CONGO — MODIFICATION OF THE USE OF THE RCAF NORTH STARS

After receipt of the information that the four North Stars had been placed under United Nations command and were being utilized for the airlifting of Moroccan troops, the Minister consulted with Mr. Pearkes and they agreed that the following message should be sent by External Affairs to the Acting Trade Commissioner in Leopoldville and to the Permanent Mission in New York, and by the RCAF to Air Transport Command, the Senior RCAF Officer, Leopoldville, and to Air Commodore Carpenter in Paris;

"From now on use of the R.C.A.F. North Stars is to be restricted to the transport of supplies and equipment for the UN force from Pisa to Leopoldville by shuttle service for a period of 30 days from July 21. The use of these aircraft for the transportation of troops is not authorized by Cabinet and is to cease forthwith."

2. In deciding upon the text of this message, the Minister was aware that it would have the incidental effect of eliminating two other uses of the aircraft previously authorized: the evacuation of refugees and the emergency transportation of food supplies to and within the Congo.

3. Air Vice Marshall Miller was present when the above text was decided upon and undertook to pass it to RCAF addressees concerned.[6]

CONGO: WITHDRAWAL OF BELGIAN TROOPS

I think we have come to about the same conclusions as you have. Specifically I think we should do what we can to keep the interpretation of the Security Council Resolution[7] flexible as Belgians have requested. By doing so we would avoid adding to the already very serious domestic political difficulties of Belgian government. I think Belgians will continue to be reasonable if they are not repeat not pushed too hard. At the same time we should quietly press Belgians to begin to withdraw some troops from Congo to Belgium as soon as local conditions permit. The arrival of some 8,000 UN troops in Congo would seem prima facie justification for at least a token withdrawal which should be a further calming influence and should help create an atmosphere in which the main problems might more easily be solved. I would prefer Canada apply any such pressure through NATO and the UN rather than directly as UK is planning to do since our interests and responsibilities in Africa are more general.

2. As for Belgian military bases in Congo, the essence of the problem seems to me to be not repeat not Belgian right to them under the treaty of friendship, though this might be evoked to gain time, but whether the bases are really needed. With Congo independent and no repeat no other overseas territory, Belgium cannot repeat not justifiably claim on her own account to need Congo bases after order is restored.

3. In general we think that we should, when framing a Canadian policy, bear in mind the attainment of three main objectives: first the restoration of order; secondly the restoration of unity; and thirdly, restoring conditions under which relatively normal life of the Nation can be resumed.

4. (A) On the first problem, order is in the course of being restored by the UN. The policy is established and is now being implemented. Evidence of good faith on all sides seems more important than the speed at which the UN troops replace Belgian, especially in the Katanga; hence the importance in our mind of at least a token Belgian withdrawal. (B) As for the restoration of unity, the best hope seems to lie in some new arrangement between Katanga and Congo proper on a confederal basis, but such an arrangement does not repeat not seem possible until Congolese leaders are more surely in the saddle, whether these be Kasavubu and Lumumba or their successors. This would seem to depend on achieving the third objective: re-establishing relatively normal conditions under which the social, economic and political life of the country could resume. And this in turn depends on outside help. To mitigate the cold-war aspect, this help should come from the UN, the UN in mufti.

This was the resolution of July 14.

5. For all of these objectives the more time we can gain the better. A phased withdrawal would be politically easier for Belgians and would facilitate the practical side of the UN operations. On the question of unity. Tshombe is showing some disposition to modify his claim for complete independence in favour of a new deal for the provinces and time is needed to encourage this tendency, to find a basis for a rapprochement and to establish the authority of Congolese leaders with whom he would have to negotiate.

6. Above all time is needed for the most difficult of the problems. The building up of a cadre of advisers and technicians. These would have a better chance of succeeding if they could work for some time while the UN troops are still there.

UNITED NATIONS OPERATIONS IN THE CONGO

During the past few weeks, while the situation in the Congo and events at the United Nations have been developing so swiftly, we have had little opportunity to assess the extent and significance of these developments but it does seem worthwhile now to make some comment on them, especially about the role of the United Nations in the Congo. You are already aware that the Secretary-General is following a three-point programme, involving an emergency stopgap arrangement for meeting the disturbed situation in the Congo, a crash programme of supply and distribution to meet the food shortage, and a longer term programme of technical assistance designed to rebuild the administrative services of the Congolese Government. In addition to these practical steps but very closely related to them, the Secretary-General, acting himself or through his representatives in Leopoldville, is engaged in detailed negotiations, mainly with the Government of Belgium but also involving other governments, for implementing the United Nations programme in the Congo.

Extent

2. The complexity of the problems facing the United Nations is enormous. Already the United Nations military Force in the Congo is almost double the size of UNEF; the national contingents are drawn from member states with much less experience than those who provided contingents for UNEF; there is a language problem which adds greatly to the difficulties of administering a mixed Force; and, of course, the geographical area to be covered by the Force is immense, aggravating the problems of communications, transportation and supply.

3. While the Force has been effective in the early days of its establishment in moving into areas of disturbance and replacing both the Belgian troops and the Force Publique as the means of maintaining law and order, in a very short time the United Nations Force may find itself in serious administrative difficulty. Strenuous efforts are being made to organize a command headquarters at Leopoldville and sub-commands in other principal locations but quite obviously the time will soon arrive when emergency arrangements will have to be replaced by an orderly system, especially as regards communications and logistic support. The likelihood is that the various battalions arriving in the Congo were provided with sufficient supplies and equipment to enable them to operate for a short time without logistic support but the need for rapidly developing an administrative tail is self-evident. In this regard, the importance of the Secretary-General's two-fold request to Canada for communications and logistics personnel and equipment cannot be over-emphasized.

4. The need for technical assistance may be a problem of lower priority than the establishment of the Force but only relatively so. The departure of the Belgians and other Europeans has left the Congolese Government virtually without administrative services and has also greatly reduced private services, like doctors and nurses. While no serious health problem has arisen yet, there is grave danger of one developing and the United Nations has been taking steps to meet that situation. The number of technicians and administrators needed for reorganizing administration in the Congo is staggering, especially since it will be necessary to bring this technical assistance to bear quickly. The United Nations is reasonably well-equipped to recruit personnel for technical assistance but the response from member states will have to be generously forthcoming if the situation in the Congo is to be met.

5. On the political side, the primary problem is for the Secretary-General to reach agreement with Belgium on the withdrawal of its military forces. On July 26 the Secretary-General travelled to Brussels for direct talks with the Belgian Government after three days' discussion with Prime Minister Lumumba in New York. The Secretary-General may need all his resources of diplomatic skill and patience in order to persuade the Belgians, who are understandably disturbed by the turn of events in the Congo. I have no doubt that the Secretary-General will try to arrange for a dignified Belgian withdrawal which will be fully consistent with Belgium's rights and other interests in the Congo. Undoubtedly, the nub of the difficulty may be the future status of Katanga Province. However, even in this regard the Secretary-General can be expected to strive for a peaceful solution through negotiation and agreement. It would be against his nature and indeed impracticable in United Nations terms for the Secretary-General to seek to impose on Belgium and on Katanga some solution which they consider detrimental.

6. As regards Katanga, it seems inconceivable that it could long exist as an independent African state supported by Belgium and its Western allies. While it is true that Katanga possesses the natural resources for economic viability, which the rest of the Congo does not, the likelihood is that the strong wind of nationalism blowing today in Africa would quickly sweep away Premier Tshombe, his followers and his supporters from the outside. It seems inconceivable that a régime, supported by white interests, could long survive as an enclave in the midst of emerging black nations. The pressures from without on the political situation within Katanga would be irresistible and whatever the West might hope to gain from supporting Premier Tshombe would soon be lost to extremists of the left. As well, the West would have incurred the bitter animosity of the surrounding African nations, which would include African members of the Commonwealth.

7. The alternative is to back the United Nations effort to bring about an agreed solution. It is undoubtedly the Secretary-General's aim to remove the Congo situation and indeed all political problems in Africa from the context of the cold war. This has been his technique in Middle East and in South-East Asia. He is persuaded that, not only is the cause of peace served by this technique, but also the best interests of the Western Powers. As Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Hammarskjöld does not consciously work for the interests of any group of powers, but he has never tried to hide that his outlook is Western and it has generally been accepted as such by the Western Powers. In dealing with the Belgians, he faces formidable opponents, who have military and economic interests in the Congo. It is already clear that some sections of the press have tried to discredit the United Nations effort in the Congo by circulating false reports (about clashes between United Nations troops and the Force Publique) and distorted descriptions of the United Nations attitude (the London Daily Mail apparently misinterpreted General Von Horn's remarks about the entry of the Force into Katanga).

Significance

8. The significance of the United Nations role in the Congo cannot be fully measured at this time but there is no doubt that it has far-reaching implications for the Congo, for Africa and for the United Nations itself. Success in the Congo may lay the groundwork for many other operations of the United Nations in Africa, especially as regards the peaceful parts of the programme. Success for the United Nations in the Congo and in Africa might establish the Organization firmly as the strongest influence for peace in the world. Undoubtedly, success in the Congo will rally public support but with that public support must come the material support, as distinct from lip service from member states. Failure, on the other hand, in the Congo might mean the final failure of the United Nations.

9. To meet the needs of the practical operations in the Congo, there has been a heartening response from member states representing all shades of opinion in the United Nations. Even the Soviet bloc has supported the United Nations effort in the Security Council and has provided material assistance. The response of the African states themselves, considering their own weaknesses, has been most encouraging. Undoubtedly, this is the response to an emergency situation; the task will be to sustain the effort in the months to come.

10. A serious and sizable problem will be the financing of the United Nations Operations in the Congo. The bill for the Force alone will greatly surpass even the expensive UNEF venture. The hope is, however, that the United Nations political stake in the Congo and in Africa generally will be considered sufficiently important to persuade them that this time the political decisions of the Organization must be backed fully with material means. This applies particularly to the Soviet bloc but as well other member states who have been just as delinquent in responding to United Nations needs in the past in comparable situations. Indeed, the United Nations response in the Congo must be regarded as marking the breakup of the log-jam in rendering material support to the Organization in its programmes of political, technical and economic assistance. If this hope is not realized, the United Nations will find itself in an impossible financial situation which may threaten its very survival.

11. You may agree that it is useful to have this assessment in mind when the Cabinet is considering the United Nations request for signals and logistic support for the Force. The assessment is also related to what Canada's attitude might be as regards the Secretary-General's negotiations with Belgium and with particular reference to the situation in Katanga. You will have seen that the United Kingdom, faced with grave problems itself in Africa, is disposed to use its influence to persuade the Belgians to withdraw its military forces completely from all parts of the Congo. The whole situation is so delicate that we would be well advised to be cautious in our own approach. Finally, we shall be required to keep the many questions under constant review in order to have our assessment of all its implications up-to-date.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE IN THE CONGO REPUBLIC

1. On July 15, the United Nations Secretary-General asked the Government of Canada for an early indication as to whether Canada would be in a position to provide the United Nations with personnel and equipment for signals and also for parts of the logistic support for the United Nations Force in the Republic of Congo. It was understood that the Secretary-General's enquiry would be stated more precisely in the course of consultations about it. On July 20-21 the Secretary-General's enquiry was explored in some detail in conversations in New York between Major-General Alexander and Mr. Henry Labouisse on the United Nations side, and Brigadier Bishop and Colonel Clement on the Canadian side.

2. The organizational structure envisaged for the United Nations Force is as follows: Headquarters United Nations Organization Congo (UNOC) at Leopoldville which will be a combined military-civilian command unit, including the Force Commander and the senior representative of the Secretary-General; four brigades (consisting in all of about 15 battalions) with headquarters in Leopoldville, Stanleyville, Luluabourg and Bukavu (Costermansville).

3. The assistance requested initially of Canada consisted of:

(a) a signal net to provide wireless communications between each of the four brigade headquarters and headquarters UNOC,

(b) internal communications for headquarters UNOC,

(c) ground to air communications at each brigade headquarters; and,

(d) organization and supervisory personnel for four composite logistic depots, one for each brigade headquarters, each capable of providing for four major units.

Because of uncertainty as to whether or not Canada would supply the troops originally requested by the Secretary-General, Major-General Von Horn has arranged for the communication networks from the headquarters in Leopoldville to the four brigade headquarters by employing civilian personnel. Since then, further revisions to the initial request have been received.

4. Consequent to the change in arrangements, as outlined above, the assistance requested of Canada now consists of the following items:

(a) In Leopoldville the signal detachment at Headquarters, UNOC including the signal office, message centre, a 100-line switchboard, linemen and despatch riders.

(b) Five ground to air communication links, and possibly two more later.

(c) Twelve mobile wireless detachments.

(d) Eight cipher detachments.

(e) The original request for four composite logistic depots may be withdrawn.

5. It is estimated, based on the limited information now available, that personnel in the following numbers will be required to meet the most recent request:

(a) Signals — about 200 officers and men.

(b) Logistic depots for four brigades (if required) — 399 officers and men.

(c) Canadian command, liaison and administration — 18 officers and men. If logistic depots are NOT provided, the administrative section would need to be increased to include certain individuals who are now included in the logistic depots in (b) above. (e.g. medical officers, paymaster, cooks, etc.).

6. The Canadian Army is now preparing personnel to meet these requirements. However, some of the personnel selected to meet the original request may not be suitable for the new role, and in consequence additional and different individuals may have to be selected and prepared. The Canadian Army can provide the number of signallers to meet the present request. All the necessary equipment can NOT, however, be provided from Canadian stocks.

7. All indications are that the United Nations operation in the Congo is proceeding as well as can be expected under the circumstances. Under an agreed programme, the Belgian military forces are being withdrawn as quickly as United Nations troops can be deployed for the purpose of maintaining order and protecting property and lives. When the United Nations Force moves in, it disarms the Force Publique of the Congo and assumes its security role. The process of re-organizing the Force Publique is a priority part of the United Nations administrative assistance but the United Nations programme calls for this re-organization after the Belgian troops have been withdrawn and the United Nations Force is firmly established to maintain order. There is every indication that the United Nations is tackling with despatch and efficiency the many difficult problems facing the Organization in the Congo. Every effort is being made to resolve political problems, like the one in Katanga Province, through negotiation and agreement.

8. As for conditions in the Congo, there appears to be no anti-white sentiment among the Congolese but only anti-Belgian. General Alexander foresaw no danger to white personnel serving with the United Nations, so that non-combatant Canadian support troops need to be supplied with personal weapons only.

9. Notwithstanding its early successes on the ground, the United Nations Force is faced with formidable problems of administration and communications. Many of the smaller members of the United Nations do not have the experience necessary for giving adequate administrative support to a mixed force. The language problem in the Congo also poses a difficulty. Canada is admirably suited to provide the assistance contemplated in the Secretary-General's request. Now that the Force contains non-African elements, as well as a large African combat component, there is no political objection to adding white personnel to the Force, even those from NATO countries.

Recommendation

10. It is therefore recommended as a matter of urgency that Canada provide the necessary military forces, including equipment, made up as follows:

(a) A signal detachment at headquarters UNOC in Leopoldville, including a signals office, message centre, 100-line switchboard, linemen and despatch riders.

(b) Five ground to air communication links.

(c) Twelve mobile wireless detachments.

(d) Eight cypher detachments.

(e) Organization and supervisory personnel for four composite logistic depots, one for each brigade, if required.

(f) A small headquarters for the command and administration of Canadian troops in the Congo.

11. To this end, the following authorities are requested:

(a) Authority is requested for the maintenance on active service of officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force, not exceeding 1,000 in number at any one time, as a part of or in immediate support of, an emergency international force under the United Nations to restore and maintain law and order in the Republic of Congo.

(b) Authority is requested to take all steps necessary to prepare troops for despatch from Canada as soon as possible. In particular, this will entail: (i) formation of such new units within the Services as may be required; (ii) selection of soldiers; (iii) immunization of soldiers; (iv) concentration of soldiers and their equipment; and (v) movement of soldiers and equipment to the Congo by the most expeditious means.

(c) It is not possible to submit final tables of organizations and equipment for this contingent until more detailed information on tasks, and conditions under which these tasks will be carried out, is available. In order to obtain this information as soon as possible, authority is requested to despatch a reconnaissance team not exceeding 20 officers and men to the Congo immediately.

(d) To the extent that satisfactory items of equipment are available, the contingent will be equipped from Canadian stocks. Authority is requested, however, for the procurement of such specialized items as signals equipment as may be necessary to carry out the assigned role. Equipment will, where possible, be purchased from Canadian sources of supply but may have to be obtained from the United States either by direct procurement or by provision by the United States to the United Nations.

(e) In order to supply reliable communications, authority is requested to negotiate with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and as a result of these negotiations, to establish a direct wireless teleprinter link, to include cypher facilities between Ottawa and the Congo. It is believed that this can be achieved economically by using existing communications from Ottawa to Nairobi and extending a link from Nairobi to Leopoldville.

(f) It should be assumed that financial arrangements will be made with the United Nations similar to those in effect for the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East. Under those arrangements the United Nations accepts, in general, the responsibility for extra costs to Canada arising from participation in the Force. The experience of the Canadian contribution to that Force indicates costs to Canada of approximately $170,000 per year in excess of the cost of maintaining these troops in Canada. This figure does not include foreign allowances which, to date, have been recovered from the United Nations. With present information available there is no basis for estimating the extra cost which might be involved in sending Canadian troops to the Congo. However, authority is requested to provide pay and allowances to Canadian troops in the United Nations Force in the Congo on the same basis as now paid to Canadian troops in the Middle East.

CONGO SITUATION; CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Prime Minister Lumumba of the Congo was coming to Ottawa the following day and would presumably be requesting aid as he had done in the United States. The U.S. Secretary of State had told Lumumba the U.S. would be glad to provide aid through United Nations channels. That would seem the best course for Canada to follow too, if it were decided to give assistance to the Congo. The situation regarding Katanga was very delicate. Canada should be careful not to get committed publicly to support the return of Katanga to the Congo. Katanga so far was friendly to the West. The United Nations was working to ensure that Katanga remained a part of the Congo.

12. The Minister of National Defence then turned to the question of what should be done in response to the request of the U.N. Secretary-General for personnel and equipment for signals and also for the logistic support for the U.N. force in the Congo. Things were moving very swiftly and the U.N. requirement was constantly changing. However, the crux of the situation was whether Canada was prepared to say that signals and perhaps logistic personnel and equipment would be sent. The assistance requested of Canada was as follows:

(b) Five ground to air communication links, and possibly two more later.

(c) Twelve mobile wireless detachments.

(d) Eight cypher detachments.

(e) The original request for four composite logistic depots (this might be withdrawn).

13. Mr. Pearkes suggested that the U.N. be informed that 200 troops were available for the first four of these items, to be used to the best advantage under the U.N., on the understanding that no detachment would be stationed at lower than Brigade Headquarters level. He entered this caveat because the battalion units, of which all but two were non-European, would be operating independently under conditions which Canadian soldiers would find very difficult. In addition, the restriction on the use of R.C.A.F. aircraft already sent to operate between Pisa and Leopoldville should be removed. Finally, a small Headquarters for Canada's forces in the area should be authorized. A few personnel as an advance party should be sent immediately, and the remainder concentrated in Canada to be moved as soon as possible.

14. Mr. Green said that, notwithstanding the evidence of confusion and disorder in the Congo, it was amazing what the U.N. had accomplished. The Belgians were withdrawing. U.N. intervention had meant the exclusion of Soviet and United States forces from the area thus preventing what would probably have been a very tense and difficult situation. Much had been made of Canada's support of the United Nations. Not to do what the Minister of National Defence had suggested would be a mistake. Accordingly, he agreed that the necessary authority be given to send the 200 personnel to the Congo.

15. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Parliament's approval should be sought for sending a force of this size outside of the country. This could take the form of a resolution, a specific vote in the estimate or a report and discussion on the estimates of the Minister of National Defence. Legally it was not necessary to take such steps as these but similar procedures had been followed for U.N.E.F. and the troops for Korea.

(b) Some expressed serious reservations about sending troops into such a chaotic situation. On the other hand it would be difficult to refuse the U.N. request.

(c) Authority should be provided to make 500 men available for the operation in the Congo in order to provide for rotation, illness, etc.

16. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that authority should be granted by Order in Council for the despatch and maintenance abroad of up to 500 officers and men of the Canadian Forces as part of or in support of the United Nations operations in the Congo;

(b) that approximately 200 officers and men be provided as soon as possible for signals and communications services;

(c) that none of the Canadian personnel should be attached to units below Brigade Headquarters level; and,

(d) that Parliament's approval be obtained for sending these forces to the Congo by the passing of an appropriate supplementary estimate.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE IN THE CONGO REPUBLIC

1. Agree that it is necessary for the government to reach a decision forthwith as to whether or not any Canadian troops are going to be sent to the Congo.

2. That 200 personnel of the Royal Canadian Signal Corps can be despatched; these to be employed to the best advantage provided that, in principle, they are concentrated as much as possible and that under no circumstances they be deployed below the Brigade Headquarters, which I understand are in established centres where the health and welfare of Canadian troops can be better protected.

3. That if Signal personnel are to be deployed outside of Leopoldville, the restriction placed on the R.C.A.F. that they are not to carry any supplies or equipment elsewhere in the Congo than Leopoldville be lifted so that, if necessary, R.C.A.F. transport can supply Royal Canadian Signal Corps detachments.

4. Canada will not be able to supply all the equipment that is indicated as being required.

5. Agree that logistic personnel be not sent.

6. Agree that a reconnaissance party be sent forthwith. A limited number of personnel are already immunized and this party could be selected from those now ready.

7. That troops to be sent to the Congo should be concentrated in Canada immediately and that they should be despatched to the Congo individually as they become ready and transport is available.

8. Owing to the uncertainty as to actual numbers, I concur in the recommendation that approval be obtained to send troops not exceeding 1,000 in number.

FORCES FOR THE CONGO
(Previous reference July 28)

1. The Prime Minister referred to a draft announcement which had been prepared in connection with the sending of Canadian forces to the Congo.

He raised the question of whether the consent of Parliament should be obtained. Parliament should be given an opportunity to express itself on this important matter, either by resolution or approval of an appropriation. Should the Government not authorize the necessary force by Order in Council?

2. The Minister of National Defence referred to the question of supplies for the Canadian personnel sent. Should the personnel be deployed outside of Leopoldville, there would be no method of supplying them unless the present restriction that the R.C.A.F. was not to carry any supplies or equipment elsewhere in the Congo than Leopoldville was lifted. He had made enquiries in this connection and found out that the best aircraft available for supplying detachments would be the Caribou aircraft developed in Canada for army operations. He thought four aircraft would be desirable. At the moment, there were two demonstrators, which could be made immediately available. A third one could be ready in September and the fourth in October. It was evident, of course, that this would stimulate the aircraft industry in the Toronto region. The total approximate cost would be about $2.8 million. These aircraft, of course, could be used by National Defence once the operations in the Congo were terminated.

3. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some felt that, in view of the fact that the operation contemplated was on a small scale, it would not be wise to give it too much attention. The public had been prepared already by the press and probably thought that the forces were already on their way. The best procedure seemed to be to supplement the items in the National Defence estimates by one providing that the funds already included could be used to meet the costs of the military personnel in the Congo.

(b) On the other hand, most thought that a formal resolution enabling all parties to indicate their stand by means of a vote on this issue would be preferable in the circumstances. The conditions under which the force would have to operate in the Congo would be entirely different to those in Egypt. Climatic conditions, the possibility of diseases, etc., added to the unrest in the population, could result in serious casualties among the forces. It was most unlikely that the Opposition would oppose the sending of the force. On the contrary, they might say that the force was too limited in number.

(c) It was felt that the size of the proposed force should not be indicated either in the resolution or in the estimates. This should be reserved for the Governor in Council to determine in the light of the circumstances of the moment. No Order in Council would be issued until the resolution had been passed.

It would be clearly understood that the resolution of the House should be sent to the Senate for its concurrence. There would be only one resolution.

4. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that a resolution be introduced in the House of Commons and sent to the Senate for concurrence, stating that it was expedient that the Houses of Parliament approve the participation of the Canadian force in the United Nations operations in the Congo; and,

(b) that arrangements be made to provide the Canadian forces with four Caribou aircraft for use in support of United Nations Operations in the Congo, and subsequently, for other purposes.

Extract from Briefing Book for the Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, July 29-31, 1960

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER LUMUMBA

According to statements made by Mr. Lumumba he has come to Canada because he and his people have been attracted by this country "as a French-speaking one" and he wishes to express his goodwill. More specifically he has said that he hopes to find some French-speaking Canadians who might be willing to work in the Congo. He perhaps also hopes to secure Canadian political support in his contests with the Belgians and with the seceding Katangans. Finally, it doubtless enhances his prestige at home to have been received by heads of other governments.

Mr. Lumumba, after a short stop in London, has been in New York discussing with the Secretary-General United Nations action in the Congo and the question of Belgian forces. He went to Washington on Wednesday of this week with the stated purpose of securing economic assistance. He was well received and was given general assurances of help on the understanding that such help would have to go through the United Nations channel, a condition which he cheerfully accepted. We do not yet know what political discussion occurred in Washington. He was an official but not a state guest there and was received by Secretary of State Herter. (The President and the Vice President were away.) He also met Mr. Eugene Black, President of the Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The Congolese portion of his party begins its homeward journey, through New York and London, on Sunday morning.

There are only five Congolese in the party, of whom only one besides the Prime Minister is known to be a person of rank. This is Mr. Joseph Kasongo, President of the Chamber of Deputies. Mr. W.F. Bull, who was our special representative at the Congolese independence ceremonies, heard good things about this man when Mr. Bull was in Leopoldville.

Very interestingly the Prime Minister is accompanied by Mr. Diallo Telli, who is the Guinean Ambassador to the United States, and by the Guinean Press Attaché in Washington. Our Permanent Mission in New York and our Embassy in Washington both report that there is keen rivalry among the representatives of Guinea, Ghana and other African countries in New York and Washington with respect to the provision of initiative and leadership in connection with Mr. Lumumba's visit to the United States. In this struggle the Guineans made the most of the advantage they possess in speaking French. Guinea, while professedly neutral, is, as you know, much oriented toward Eastern Europe. We did not intentionally invite these Guineans who therefore may be regarded as guests of our guest of honour. Departmentally, of course, we shall be civil to the Guineans but we intend to deal with the Congolese directly and not through the Guineans. We can hope that the Guineans will not be a nuisance in respect to the press or the public.

Two Ghanaians who have been travelling with Mr. Lumumba in the United States, have also come here. One is Mr. Quaison-Sackey, Ghanaian Ambassador to the United Nations who expects to become Ghanaian High Commissioner in Ottawa. The other is in an information officer.

Mr. Hammarskjöld has vividly described Mr. Lumumba as "very responsive to friendship and to frankness, impressionable but apt to be swayed by changing influences" and especially by the last person or group to exert influence. He is "ignorant, very suspicious, shrewd but immature in his ideas — the smallest in scope of any of the African leaders" known to the Secretary-General. Our chargé in Washington describes him as socially inept but apparently desirous of pleasing, and "simple and unassuming in private conversation." Our Ambassador to the United Nations found him "tired and bewildered by New York." A short biographical sketch is attached to this brief.†

We know little about Mr. Lumumba's political position among his own people. The press reports that parliament has been recessed. Mr. Kasavubu is President of the republic and is both Mr. Lumumba's colleague and principal rival. We believe Mr. Lumumba not to be a communist although there are a number of communists in his Cabinet. Although observers had forecast possibly serious disorders in the Congo, it cannot be judged how far the present difficulties were communist inspired. The Prime Minister describes himself as neutral in East-West politics. He is in fact playing each side against the other politically and economically and will probably continue to do so as long as he considers this to be profitable.

While perhaps Mr. Lumumba's remarks may make it necessary to discuss with him East-West relations and the international scene generally, it seems to be doubtful whether it would be desirable for us to go into these matters further than his initiative in the conversation may force us to. As to Congolese politics, you are aware that the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires has made strong representations against Mr. Lumumba's visit. Doubtless you will wish to emphasize that we are friends and wish to remain friends of Belgians and Congolese and to assist each of them in what must be their common endeavour to re-establish a peaceful and economically viable country. Mr. Lumumba through inexperience may on his arrival embarrass us, as he has embarrassed the Americans, by attacking the Belgians in public.

The following pages contain a few notes about subjects which Mr. Lumumba may raise. In respect to economic or technical assistance, if any assurances are given it would seem necessary to reiterate that the United Nations channel will have to be used. This is indeed probably the only practicable channel. (We have now learned that this will also be the American procedure.)

It would be helpful if one particular matter could be taken up directly with Mr. Lumumba. Our Acting Trade Commissioner in Leopoldville has asked the Congolese authorities for an agrément to raise the status of our office to a consulate-general and to hope to be able to send one of our foreign service officers to Leopoldville as consul-général in the very near future. You may wish to inform Mr. Lumumba of this decision and ask him to do whatever he can to expedite our request.

Economic Aid

Mr. Lumumba will wish to discuss recruitment of French-speaking technicians in a wide variety of fields for service in the Congo. He has not explicitly stated that he will seek financial assistance from the Canadian Government for this purpose, but as the Congo is in serious financial difficulties, it is reasonable to assume that Mr. Lumumba has Canadian-financed technical assistance in mind.

None of the existing Canadian external aid programmes includes the Congo, or could be applied to it under the terms of the appropriations made by Parliament. There are, therefore, no funds available for Canadian technical assistance to the Congo, and new appropriations would have to be sought if it were decided to undertake an aid programme there. Strictly from the economic standpoint, there is at present far too little information available about the precise needs of the Congo for any recommendation to be made on what bilateral aid Canada might undertake to provide. For this reason, because the magnitude of the Commonwealth economic development programme for Africa which was discussed at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference has not yet been decided upon, and because Canadian aid for the Congo would probably give rise to requests for similar aid from other French-speaking territories in Africa, it would seem preferable to avoid any commitment to Mr. Lumumba.

The Congolese interest in obtaining aid from Canada arises in part, at least, from the fact that Canada is the only extra-European country with substantial training facilities in the French language and a large pool of French-speaking expert personnel. Provided that these resources are not over-burdened to the extent that Canada's own requirements cannot be met, the existing arrangements whereby the Canadian Government gives administrative assistance to some non-Canadian agencies in placing trainees in Canada and recruiting Canadian experts for service abroad could be used for the benefit of the Congo. Aid-giving agencies in the United States (public and private) and the United Nations have already expressed an interest in obtaining Canadian cooperation for this purpose. The assistance of the Canadian departments concerned can be provided at no direct cost.

It would, therefore, be possible to indicate to Mr. Lumumba that Canada is prepared to give its full co-operation to the United Nations in providing assistance to the Congo, and that requests for Canadian help received through the United Nations would be dealt with with sympathy and dispatch. Canada's contributions to the United Nations Special Fund and Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance will, of course, be used in part in the Congo. In this way a negative response to his approach could be avoided and he could be encouraged to rely to a large extent on the United Nations for development assistance, as it is better equipped at present than any other entity to assess and meet the Congo's needs and is already seized with the problem.

Should Mr. Lumumba wish and be able to make business arrangements with private concerns in Canada, presumably there would be no reason to discourage him.

Scholarships and Teacher Training

If questions are raised about the availability of scholarships for Congolese students, or about securing help in teacher training, it can be pointed out that none of the existing Canadian aid programmes includes African countries other than those in the Commonwealth. The most recent statement on the question of Canadian scholarships for French-speaking students was that made by Mr. Green in the House on July 14. An extract from his speech is attached.†

In the event that the Congolese scholarships could be financed by the Congo or other agencies, administrative assistance could be given in arranging to have them placed in French-language universities in this country.

With regard to teachers, while there are no government funds available to send them to the Congo, again, if their expenses could be paid from other sources, Canadian assistance could be given in recruiting them through various channels, including the Economic and Technical Assistance Branch and teachers' organizations such as the Canadian Teachers' Federation and L'Association Canadienne des éducateurs de langue française. It should be noted, however, that it would be very difficult to engage competent teachers at this time of year, since practically all of them would have long since signed contracts for the school year which begins in September.

Canadian Red Cross Medical Teams

The Canadian Red Cross, in response to a request from the Security Council, communicated through the World Health Organization and the International Office of the Red Cross, is sending to the Congo two medical teams each consisting of one surgeon, one physician experienced in the treatment of tropical diseases, and two nurses, all bilingual.

The four doctors and four nurses are now en route to the Congo where they will help to supply the urgent need for medical attention to civilians in hospitals, the staffs of which have been depleted by the departure of their European members.

Canadian Missionaries in Congo

There seems no need for us to raise this business: we would thus avoid possibly difficult questions about the future intentions of Canadian evacuees and the future safety of Europeans in general. (As far as we know, some missionary societies intend to send back their people when their safety will be reasonably assured.)

The facts, as of July 27, are: Including 35 Canadians who are now known to have left the Congo before the emergency began and 19 Canadians who were either stationed in the Trust Territory of Urundi or have since moved there, a total of 185 Canadians are known to be in places of safety outside the Congo, while 2 others are reported safe in Leopoldville. This means that 86 Canadians remained to be accounted for by name. While nominal rolls are still coming in of those evacuated, particularly to adjacent areas, many missionaries are reported to have chosen not to leave the Congo, and Canadians not yet reported by name as having been evacuated may well be included among their number.

Belgian Forces in Katanga

The problem of the withdrawal of Belgian troops from the province of Katanga, which has announced its secession from the Congo Republic and has asked the "free world" to acknowledge its independence is one of the most difficult which faces the United Nations. The Prime Minister of Katanga, Mr. Tshombe, has said that he would oppose the entry of United Nations troops to replace the Belgian troops which are now maintaining law and order in the province and to do this would even use armed force. However, in the last forty-eight hours he appears to have retreated somewhat from this categorical position. A compromise solution among Mr. Tshombe, the Congolese authorities and the United Nations is well within the realm of possibility. There does not seem to be any present reason for Canada to take any position on Katanga's status. Should Mr. Lumumba raise the question we might say that we are wholeheartedly behind the United Nations effort in the Congo and that we hope that the problem can be resolved to the mutual satisfaction of all the parties concerned. We would not consider that the peaceful entry of United Nations troops would in any way prejudice the right of the people of Katanga to consider constitutional arrangements at a later date, but we believe that the most necessary thing at present in the Congo is to restore and maintain law and order in order to provide the necessary conditions for the resumption of normal economic, social life and political life of the Congo.

CONVERSATIONS WITH MR. LUMUMBA

Mr. Lumumba and his party called on Mr. Cadieux shortly after 11 am on Saturday, July 30. Miss Osborne, Messrs Scott, Murray and Choquette of the Department were present.

2. Mr. Cadieux welcomed Mr. Lumumba and recalled that pending a call from the Prime Minister, the programme foresaw official talks; he said that he would be grateful if Mr. Lumumba wished to make any observations of a general nature, on the United Nations, on his conversations in Washington, prior to a discussion of specific problems. Mr. Lumumba said that he preferred to deal with the latter first.

3. Mr. Cadieux then proceeded to outline what could be done for the Congo under existing programmes:

(a) students from the Congo will be eligible for Canada Council scholarships;

(b) applications could be received for National Research Council scholarships;

(c) a broad scheme of scholarships involving French-language institutions in this country was now under consideration and, if the Government decided to adopt such a scheme, the Congo would be included;

(d) Canada was likely to support UN schemes of technical assistance for the Congo;

(e) if other countries were to assist Congolese students, it was likely that some of these students would come to Canadian universities. The Canadian Government would be prepared to extend administration assistance to facilitate the operation of these schemes.

Furthermore, Mr. Cadieux pointed out that Canada was providing immediate assistance in meeting specific UN requests; for instance, Canada had provided meat and flour; four RCAF planes were flying supplies from Pisa to Leopoldville, and the Government had now agreed to make available a substantial number of signals personnel.

4. Mr. Lumumba listened to this enumeration without any reaction. He stated that in addition to UN assistance, as a sovereign, independent country, the Congo was now requesting from Canada a supplementary bilateral aid programme and hoping that the Canadian Government could send immediately to the Congo a team to discuss requirements and priorities.[8] Mr. Cadieux pointed out that such a procedure would be likely to involve duplication as similar assessments would be undertaken by other countries who would be prepared to give help and also by the United Nations: he added that while Canada would very likely support an expanded

He withdrew this when he saw me. [J.G. Diefenbaker]

UN programme of assistance and would use machinery in existence already to do so, apart from the Commonwealth plan, there was no precedent for a bilateral aid programme. Mr. Lumumba, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, the Guinean and the Ghanaian Ambassadors intervened in turn to explain that UN assistance was not satisfactory: it could be terminated at the request of the Congo, UN experts would be withdrawn and the Congo would have to start again from scratch. They implied that somehow UN technical assistance was not fully compatible with the independence of the Congo and in circumstances unspecified, was likely to be brought to a sudden end. Mr. Cadieux argued that Canada envisaged UN assistance operations as a long-range one of indefinite duration and kept urging the advantage of this approach which had already been tried and found to be successful. Mr. Lumumba then rather sharply stated that obviously we were not agreed as to the best approach. The Congo wanted bilateral aid in addition to UN assistance: while Canada apparently was prepared to support only the latter.[9] The necessary conclusions had to be drawn and there was no point in pursuing the discussion. Mr. Cadieux said that Canada was clearly in favour of multilateral help: the question of supplementary bilateral arrangements was one for the Government to decide. He was not excluding it as a possibility but merely pointing out that a request on the part of the Congo for a bilateral aid agreement with Canada involved a special new and somewhat difficult policy decision for the Government. No doubt Mr. Lumumba would raise this matter with the Prime Minister, but Mr. Cadieux felt that the discussion had been useful in elucidating how far present arrangements could be used and on what specific point a new policy decision was not required.

5. Shortly after 12 Mr. Lumumba, accompanied by Mr. Kasango, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, called on the Prime Minister. Messrs. Campbell and Cadieux were present, the latter acting as an interpreter. The first part of the interview was very difficult indeed. Mr. Lumumba was behaving like a hostile witness. The Prime Minister was endeavouring to obtain from him some indication of the scope of his requirements and of priorities. He asked, for instance, how many civil servants there were before independence, and how many were now left. The Congolese Prime Minister was most uncooperative. He said that these were political questions and that he had no mandate to discuss them. When the Prime Minister insisted that he had to have some idea of the magnitude of the problem, Mr. Lumumba kept repeating that he needed specialists, experts of all kinds, and that as Prime Minister of an independent country, he was not really concerned with numbers, scales of pay, etc. These were details to be settled by his Ministers. The temperature was rising and it was clear that no progress was being made in spite of the Prime Minister's repeated appeals to Mr. Lumumba to assist him in understanding his problem.

6. The Prime Minister then suggested that Mr. Balcer, who had greeted Mr. Lumumba at the airport and entertained him on the previous day, should join the conversation. When Mr. Balcer arrived, attempts to draw Mr. Lumumba were pursued for a while without much success, until the Prime Minister asked bluntly whether we or the Congolese Government would be expected to pay for these experts. Mr. Lumumba was quick to reply that his Government would pay all expenses, and would be prepared to be generous. He added that he did not expect another Government to pay for the services of Congolese civil servants. This put the matter in a very clearly different perspective. Mr. Lumumba rather unkindly blamed Canadian Government officials for the misunderstanding. The Prime Minister warned Mr. Lumumba that he would have, as Prime Minister, to learn to accept responsibility for the mistakes and shortcomings of his advisors. In reply to a question from Mr. Cadieux, Mr. Lumumba said that a liaison mission would not be required as our office in Leopoldville could handle all details.

[9] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Ditto. [J.G. Diefenbaker]

7. From then on the atmosphere of the conversation became cordial. The Prime Minister undertook to provide, in effect, our good offices in the recruitment of bilingual experts. The Congolese representatives, it transpired, were hoping that we might find it possible to screen applicants for them and to give them, in fact, some recommendation as to their moral character and professional qualifications. The Congolese Government were prepared to be generous as to salary and allowances. They felt that it would be helpful if we could give them an indication as to what the appropriate salary might be in specific cases. The Prime Minister suggested that we could provide an indication of average income for the main professions as compiled by our Department of National Revenue. He pointed out that the figures would be lower than in the United States, and perhaps insufficient in individual cases.

8. When the Prime Minister enquired whether Mr. Lumumba had additional requests to make, the latter said that it would be most helpful if three experts could be provided immediately: one on radio (public relations); one on mines, and one on protocol. The Prime Minister repeatedly indicated his sympathy for the Congolese leader's difficulties in nation building, with scant initial resources and undertook to do what he could to assist. Mr. Lumumba expressed full satisfaction with the outcome of the interview.

9. Later, at a press conference outside the Prime Minister's office, Mr. Lumumba confirmed that the interview had been cordial and successful. He refused, however, to discuss his meeting earlier in the morning with the Soviet Ambassador. On the question of diplomatic relations between Canada and the Congo, he was less than accurate: while this had not been discussed with the Prime Minister, he told the press that this had been done; he claimed that before independence, Canada had a Chargé d'Affaires in Leopoldville. He went on to point out that the two countries were already in diplomatic relations and said that the question of an appointment of a Congolese representative in Ottawa would be considered by his Government after his return to Leopoldville.

10. While we can not of course be absolutely certain about this, and while our officials may have been mistaken as to what Mr. Lumumba really wanted, it is possible that he may have experienced a change of heart between his conversation with our officials and the one that he had later with the Prime Minister. On being told that bilateral aid was unlikely to be provided, or at least to be forthcoming immediately, Mr. Lumumba may have decided to settle for less, and to request merely official assistance in recruiting bilateral experts. When he found that we would not be prepared to pay for them, he may have reconciled himself to suggesting that his Government should foot the bill. This would explain his decision to drop the request as to a liaison team and the different terminology in the Prime Minister's office where there was no reference to a bilateral agreement, but merely to authorization concerning recruitment. If this is the case, and our suspicions are increased by Mr. Lumumba's quickness to blame officials for the misunderstanding, this suggests a very disturbing trait and would warrant some caution in cooperation with his recruiting schemes. The whole operation should be undertaken with care, I suggest, until we have some indication as to how the first recruits are treated. In any event, close liaison with the United Nations to avoid duplication will be required.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], August 1, 1960

MR. LUMUMBA

We had few opportunities to form impressions concerning Mr. Lumumba. He was in Ottawa for a short time and he consistently refused, in his conversations with the Prime Minister and with officers to deal with political subjects. The few observations we have been able to make may, however, warrant some tentative conclusions as to his personality.

2. It is interesting to note that Mr. Lumumba decided to cut his visit short, deleting the part which was intended to minimize somewhat the importance of the visit and which provided consequently few opportunities for direct contact with the public. Mr. Lumumba was almost rude in refusing to be drawn into political discussions. When told that the Prime Minister might be waiting for him, he said that this was quite in order; it was up to the Prime Minister to do the waiting. When it was suggested to him that his time of departure had to be delayed because a number of appointments had been made for him in the expectation that he would leave later, and because people were coming from Toronto and Montreal and they would be disappointed, he dismissed this summarily, saying that in five minutes he could dispose of each applicant and that the others could write to him in Leopoldville.

3. Mr. Lumumba was more enlightening in his speech after Mr. Drouin's luncheon. The essence of his argument was that the Belgians were not prepared to understand that the Congolese could run their own affairs; they had not prepared them for independence. The Belgians had calculated that because of this the Congolese would have no choice but to turn to them for assistance, and they would then be in a position to impose political conditions. (This implies a confession that the Congolese realize their weakness and places their request for experts from Canada in a special light.) Mr. Lumumba kept stressing that the Belgians could not conceive that the Congolese could exercise authority over Belgians. When the Congolese had decided after independence to take things into their own hands, the Belgians had accused Lumumba and his supporters of being Communists. Lumumba was very specific in stating that the Congo and the other African states were not and would never be communists. They wanted to enjoy their freedom and to develop their own culture which had been hindered by the Belgians. Mr. Lumumba made the point that while other countries had invested in their colonial dependencies, Belgium was the only metropolitan country which had been enriched as a result of the exploitation of its colonies. While there were some reassuring aspects in Mr. Lumumba's statement, it was noticeable that at the airport he greeted the Soviet Ambassador in a very friendly and warm fashion and he had a long secret interview with him. At his press conference after his interview with the Prime Minister he carefully avoided admitting that such a conversation had taken place. Furthermore, there is some reason to be concerned as to the role of the Guinean Ambassador as a member of the official party.

4. While Mr. Lumumba, in his conversation with Mr. Cadieux, seemed to be pressing for bilateral aid and for a liaison mission from Canada, in the Prime Minister's office he merely requested administrative assistance in recruiting bilingual experts and he dropped the suggestion as to a liaison mission because, he argued, administrative details could be handled through our mission in Leopoldville. While the question of diplomatic relations had not been discussed with the Prime Minister, Mr. Lumumba said in the course of his press conference that this had been done. This suggests a certain lack of candour, to say the least.

5. Mr. Lumumba was very tired when he reached Ottawa. Yet he handled press queries at the airport very creditably. On the following day, he spoke eloquently and forcefully at the luncheon offered by the Speaker of the Senate. There is no doubt that Mr. Lumumba can handle himself effectively in public. While he steadfastly refused to discuss anything but help with us, his attitude as regards the Soviet Ambassador is suspicious. His possible volte-face on aid and his fierce attacks on Belgium and, by implication, Western countries in general, gave some grounds perhaps for the view that his independent recruiting of experts in this country should be watched carefully. Mr. Lumumba is perhaps not unnaturally very concerned about his position and not very considerate of others. While he may not be a Communist, his conduct is equivocal and it is easy to understand that the Belgians must have found it very difficult to get along with him.

6. From the observations we have been able to make in the course of the visit, the elements to reconcile concerning Mr. Lumumba's visit to Canada seem to be the following:

(a) public professions of friendship;

(b) unwillingness to confide in us and to explain, even in general terms, his intentions;

(c) an apparent willingness to talk to Soviet representatives;

(d) fierce anti-Belgian and, it is suspected, anti-Western feelings;

(e) urgent requests for bilingual experts.

It is tempting to reconcile these elements by suggesting that Mr. Lumumba wants experts from this country, so that he can get rid of the Belgians and do as he pleases later. He may be afraid, however, that if we were to penetrate his intentions, we might not be willing to cooperate.

7. On the basis of our few contacts with him, to summarize our views, Mr. Lumumba seems to us to be an ardent African nationalist whose attitude as regards occidental countries and the Soviet bloc is still equivocal and warrants careful study. Mr. Lumumba left us with the impression that he is vain, petty, boorish, suspicious and perhaps unscrupulous.

GHANA AND CONGO

President Nkrumah has asked me to transmit as a matter of urgency following personal message for Prime Minister. "It has been put up to UN that Ghana can help in problem of training Congolese cadets as officers for the Force Publique. Such training should be based on Ghana Military Academy which is at present staffed largely by British. We can do this only if we can obtain French speaking staff from outside Ghana. A first survey showing personnel required are: a chief instructor; three platoon commanders; one company Sergeant-Major; four drill and weapon Sergeants; one physical training instructor; one education non-commissioned officer; one admin officer; two clerks; three stores men; two general duty men. The above should all be military personnel.

In addition to the requirement of graduate academic instructors is two or three covering French and current affairs and mathematics and general science.

I would be grateful if you would indicate your ability to assist. If Canada can assist I suggest a senior officer come to Ghana as soon as possible to work out details on ground."

2. I have been in touch with General Alexander who supports this Ghanaian proposal. He commented he would not repeat not want other than Canadian service personnel to assist.

3. Before making firm commitment you may wish to send senior service officer to prepare appreciation.

4. In my conversation with Alexander I told him I doubted very much whether Canada would be prepared to take on this assignment on any terms other than complete financial repayment.

GHANA AND CONGO REQUEST FOR CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

Our reference telegram contained the full text of a personal message from Nkrumah to our Prime Minister about the desire by Ghana for Canadian assistance in training Congolese cadets.

2. While I appreciate that Canadian effort in Congo is already of large proportions, I would hope that you could give sympathetic consideration to this Ghanaian request. As you know past efforts to obtain cooperation between Ghana and Canada in the defence field have not repeat not been very successful. This current request might be an opportunity for us both to indicate Commonwealth cooperation and to make an identifiable contribution to the development of law and order in Congo.

3. Undoubtedly in your consideration of the desirability of meeting this Ghanaian request you will wish to consult UN about the extent to which it approves this Ghanaian initiative. As you know, Ghana has been extending technical assistance to Congo on what appears to be a bilateral basis. While one may not repeat not quarrel with Ghana assisting a brother African state, there are it seems to me long term implications, not repeat not only for Ghana in terms of its own economy, but in the sense that continuing bilateral arrangements between Ghana and Congo set a precedent for Congo to seek assistance from Soviet Bloc which, if on a large scale, would in the long run be undesirable for not repeat not only the West but for the independent African states themselves. We will continue to hear a great deal about the iniquities of the white man in Africa, the evils of colonialism and the perfidious intentions of the "imperialist" but it is important to remember that African states either do not repeat not or will not repeat not admit the perfidious nature of the "white faced" communist.

CONGO — TRAINING OF FORCES PUBLIQUE

The Prime Minister to-day received a telegram from Mr. Hammarskjöld in Leopoldville which reads as follows: "As you know we are making a big effort, being part of a general plan of assistance to the Republic of the Congo, to re-establish as quickly as possible the so-called Force Publique (L'Armée Nationale), with a view to arranging for withdrawal as early as possible of the United Nations Force, its responsibilities being taken over by national units. This does involve the speedy reorganization of the Force Publique by a training programme with United Nations instructors as requested by the Government of the Republic. I would be most happy to hear from you whether Canada would be able to provide us with French-speaking officers willing to undertake the assignment, under United Nations flag, to serve as advisors and instructors in our trained programme for officers of the Force Publique. It is of course essential to avoid getting entangled into jealousies and rivalries. For that reason, while using African instructors, I want to have some of non-African nationalities. With kind regards,"

2. The Canadian Government is disposed to comply with this request but would wish to have further information about the numbers required and the timing. For your own information the Government would be prepared to consider supplying up to 100 personnel but is thinking in terms of about 50. Personnel will have to be inoculated which would delay departure for a matter of weeks.

3. We would also be interested to know if the Secretariat can throw any light on the question of whether there is any relationship between this proposal and the Ghanaian request referred to in your telegram 1164 of August 11.†

au premier ministre

President of Ghana
to Prime Minister

Accra, August 12, 1960

My dear Prime Minister,

I am sorry that the pressure of events has made it impossible for me to write to you before concerning the policy which Ghana is pursuing in regard to Congo. Naturally I should have liked to have informed you of our intentions before we took action, but, as you will realise, events have moved so fast that it was quite impossible to delay.

The policy of my Government throughout has been to isolate the Congo situation and to act in such a way as to prevent the direct intervention of any of the Great Powers in the African Continent.

As you know, my policy has always been that at all costs Africa must not be involved in the Cold War.

When emerging countries such as the Republic of Congo are threatened by interests outside the African Continent, they must naturally look for help from whatever source they can obtain it. The object of my Government has always been to reassure Congo that this help would be forthcoming from within the African Continent and that it was therefore unnecessary to seek help from outside. Ghana's policy throughout has been determined on this basis.

Generally speaking, I believe that initiative in African affairs should come from the Independent African States. While help from any outside source is always of value, the value of this help is much reduced if it is not channelled through an African medium. The African Continent is automatically involved in Great Power disputes if one country assists another on the basis of any alliance or organisation primarily designed for other parts of the world. For example, in my view it would be most undesirable if any Great Power allowed its policy in Africa to be dictated in the interests of any defence or other agreement which it had with other powers in relation to any other part of the world.

A view widely held in Congolese political circles has been that those powers who are associated in N.A.T.O. would, because of their military commitments to Belgium, be unable to take an impartial view of the events in Congo. Some colour, I feel, has been given to this view by the failure on a number of occasions of various N.A.T.O. Powers to support the Security Council resolutions. The suspicion has thus grown that because of consideration of European political issues, the Western Powers were unwilling for the United Nations to take really effective action in Congo.

In my view the most important issue in Congo affairs is the position of Katanga. I do not think that there can be any doubt at all that the so-called Katanga régime is a pure puppet régime of the Belgians. Mr. Tshombe and his party, the Conakat Bureau, are well known to us in Accra. He and members of his party have attended conferences here and we have on many occasions discussed African policy. What Mr. Tshombe is saying to-day bears no resemblance to what he used to say in Accra. I can only attribute the sudden change to the fact that he has had to accommodate his policy to the policy of the power whose forces are to-day occupying Katanga.

I feel, however, that the most recent resolution of the Security Council[10] shows that with the exception of France and Italy, all those powers associated with N.A.T.O. are prepared to take a broader and a more general view of the situation. Ghana will certainly support to the full the Security Council resolutions.

In regard to the wider issues, I should like to make these comments:

I think that all Independent African States are disturbed by the revelations now being made by Belgium as to the extent of N.A.T.O. participation in the Belgian Congo bases and particularly in their participation in the Katanga base which had been established at Kamina.

[10] C'était la résolution du 9 août. Voir Documents on International Affairs 1960 (London: Oxford University Press/Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1964), pp. 285-86.
This was the resolution of August 9. See Documents on International Affairs 1960 (London: Oxford University Press/Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1964), pp. 285-86.

This base is situated in the very heart of Africa and it is difficult for me to understand what possible relation a base in this part of the world could have to North Atlantic defence. A suspicion must arise that such a base was intended to provide military support for the continued colonial ascendancy of N.A.T.O. Powers in Africa.

All Independent African States are gravely concerned about the situation in the Portuguese territories of Angola and Mozambique. There is no doubt that the situation there is far more explosive than is generally realised. The Portuguese régime is extremely oppressive and it denies to the inhabitants of these territories every single one of the rights referred to in the preamble of the North Atlantic Treaty. I hope therefore that those members of the Commonwealth who are also members of N.A.T.O. will use their influence with the Portuguese Government to initiate a movement for independence of the Portuguese territories. It would create a most serious situation in Africa if the N.A.T.O. Powers were manoeuvred into the position of supporting Portuguese colonial tyranny on the ground that Portugal was entitled to their support as a member of N.A.T.O.

In regard to Ruanda Urundi, it seems to me quite clear that the Belgian Trusteeship must end, and I think that the best course would be for it to be placed under the joint trusteeship of the Independent African States. In present circumstances there can be no justification for calling from outside Africa former colonial powers to exercise the authority of the United Nations.

When the African States take over the trusteeship of Ruanda Urundi it would be appropriate for them also to take over the trusteeship of South-West Africa. It is to my mind absolutely impossible for the African States to agree to allow the present state of affairs to continue indefinitely in this area.

In regard to aid to Congo, I have had a personal letter from President Eisenhower which I have discussed with the United States Ambassador here and to which I have replied. Mr. Eisenhower suggested to me that all aid to Congo should be channelled through the United Nations. There are, however, great objections to this course. It would mean applying a restriction to Congo which does not apply to any other African State. Further, there are innumerable practical difficulties. I have suggested as an alternative that aid should be channelled through the Independent African States or at any rate through one or more of them. I think this meets his point of view which was to isolate Congo from competing pressures of the Great Powers.

I have tried to give you as detailed an explanation as possible of the action which my Government has felt itself compelled to take in Congo. I trust that you will do all that lies in your power to promote the establishment of peace and security in Congo.

Yours sincerely,

KWAME NKRUMAH

UN DIFFICULTIES IN THE CONGO

Following for the Minister:

We have been very concerned at the recent news from the Congo and at the possible outcome of further Security Council discussions on this subject. Lumumba's criticism of Hammarskjöld[11] raises fundamental questions as to the role of the UN and, indeed, the whole future of the Congo itself.

2. In case you should have a conversation with Hammarskjöld, we have given thought here to a possible line of approach which might be put to him and possibly to certain African delegations in New York: the same arguments could be used also in Accra where, we understand, there is now a tendency to follow a more sober line in regard to Congo developments.

3. A possible point of departure might be taken from Lumumba's obvious appeal to African nationalist aspiration in attempting to settle independently, e.g. without UN interference, his domestic affairs and to enlist, if possible, in coping with the local situation, assistance, primarily of African states. This is an approach which non-African countries need not necessarily oppose. It is one which might even provide a basis for cooperation with them, at least if its inherent limitations are appreciated.

4. We assume that most African states are basically concerned with preventing the issue from involving big blocs in direct conflict. If this is the case, the African states are bound to realize that an appeal to either side, in the event of UN failure, would be bound to defeat their basic aspirations not to become pawns in the big power rivalry. The question then arises whether cooperation and assistance from sources outside Africa, which we assume are essential even to an African solution, will really be possible outside the UN framework. Appeals to individual European or other countries are not likely to be satisfactory as this is likely to involve delays and limitations which can hardly be accepted in the circumstances.

5. If it is agreed that in terms of African aspirations there is in fact no immediate practical alternative to UN assistance, then the problem is one of determining what are the necessary limitations and whether such limitations are acceptable. While it is clear that on the one hand there can be no direct intervention in Congolese domestic affairs, it must be accepted as obvious, on the other, that the UN cannot allow itself to become the instrument of the Congolese Government in matters which are controversial in terms of east-west conflict or in general UN context.

6. Even with such limitations, it seems to us that the case for UN assistance is strong. The direct benefits of the UN presence for the Congolese government are in themselves quite substantial. The maintenance of law and order, for instance, should enable the Congolese government to operate initially, and gradually to establish itself. The alternatives in this field are far from obvious or likely to be satisfactory to all concerned including African states. Furthermore, the basic framework provided by the UN should enable the Congolese government, with the help of other African governments if so desired, to develop machinery of its own to enforce such policies as it may determine later on to be in the national interest.

7. In short, it seems to us that the African states might be encouraged to consider whether there can be an acceptable alternative to UN operations, and whether the Congolese government and friendly neighbouring states will not, as a result of such operations (even if they involve limitations), be given the necessary basic and expanding freedom of action which they require to work out the African solutions which they may desire.

8. In the circumstances would it not be in the interests of all concerned and, in particular, of the African states, to accept the temporary and rather modest limitations inherent in UN operations. It occurs to us that if properly handed, such limitations, from the African point of view, e.g. the presence of non African units in the UN forces, may even have advantages in setting the stage for cooperation between African states and those of other continents. The same considerations apply with greater force in relation to the broad programme of technical and other assistance which is now being worked out. In fact, through the UN, outside assistance even for African solutions is likely to be available sooner and to be more substantial than would otherwise be the case.

9. While we would not wish to suggest directly in Accra that moderation should be recommended to Lumumba, we wonder whether you think that it would be useful for our High Commissioner there to raise the above problems in the form of questions, and to suggest that in terms of African aspirations, patience and moderation in dealing with the UN may yet provide the best, if not the only, solution.

CONGO: SOVIET COMPLAINTS ABOUT CANADIAN CONTINGENT

On August 6 the Soviet representative left a memorandum with the Secretary-General objecting to the inclusion of Canadian troops in the United Nations Force in the Congo.[12] Mr. Green dealt with a question on this subject in the House on August 8 (a copy of his remarks is attached).†

The United Nations Secretariat, in dealing with the Soviet complaint, maintained that the inclusion of Canadians in the Force was based on their technical competence and linguistic qualifications. The Secretary-General saw no inconsistency in the fact that Canada was a member of NATO.

See United Nations, Official Records of the Security Council, Fifteenth Year, Supplement for July, August and September 1960, document S/4418.

On August 18 there occurred the incident at Njili airport in which Canadian soldiers were manhandled and beaten by the Congolese Force Publique. This action was the subject of vigorous protests from Canada and from the United Nations. The Chief of Staff of the Force Publique has formally expressed regret (to Dr. Bunche in Leopoldville) about the incident. Prime Minister Lumumba, who also expressed some regret, described it as an excess of zeal on the part of Congolese personnel checking the identity of foreigners. He partly blamed Canadians for the incident, although this was not borne out by the United Nations report on the incident. On the contrary, it appeared as part of a planned hostility against the United Nations.

On August 20 Mr. Kuznetsov, the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister, at a press conference in New York demanded the withdrawal of "armed groups from Canada," because they were allies of the Belgian aggressors. The Secretary-General reported to Mr. Ritchie that Mr. Kuznetsov had taken the line that "now you realize how unwise it was to send Canadian troops to the Congo." The Secretary-General held firm to his policy on the inclusion of Canadians, adding that the only restrictions were that members of contingents (a) should not be nationals of one of the great powers and (b) that they should come from a country which had no involvement in the issues in the Congo. Canada was not affected by either of these.

In his speech in the Security Council on August 21, Mr. Kuznetsov returned to the charge. He vigorously attacked the inclusion of Canadians in the Force. He demanded their withdrawal. He had nothing to say about the Swedes and the Irish who are in the Force in large numbers. He hammered away at the link with Belgium, which he called the aggressor, even though most of the Belgian combat troops have already been withdrawn and the remainder are awaiting only the availability of aircraft.

In reply to Mr. Kuznetsov in the Council the Secretary-General, who in a longer statement explained his action taken to implement the Council resolutions, defended his policy of selecting Canadians for the Force and showed no sign of regretting or changing his position in that regard. He had informed Mr. Ritchie that he would hold to this stand. The Secretary-General considered it unnecessary and perhaps undesirable for Canada to intervene in the Council debate, a view which Mr. Ritchie shared.

In the debate the Congolese representative did not raise the question of including white troops in the Congo Force, nor of withdrawing Canadians. He did reiterate the demand that the airports and ports of entry be placed under Congolese control. He also pressed for the establishment of an advisory committee. The Secretary-General has indicated that he would accept one composed of representatives of countries participating in the Force. The Guineans' representative made an inflammatory speech but he did not raise the question of white contingents in the Force.

The majority of Council members fully endorsed the policies which the Secretary-General had followed in implementing the earlier resolutions. A Soviet resolution was not pressed to the vote. It called for the establishment of an Afro-Asian commission which would assist the Secretary-General in his activities in the Congo, quite different from the advisory committee which he envisages. No resolution was passed but this result is interpreted as full acquiescence in the programme of implementation which the Secretary-General has been following.

The representatives of Argentina, Ceylon, Italy, United Kingdom, United States and Ecuador wholly rejected the Soviet charges about the inclusion of Canadian troops. Mr. Ritchie has reported that the Secretary-General's policy as regards the composition of the Force was fully vindicated.

It seems that the Soviet Union was mainly interested in undermining the United Nations effort in the Congo by trying to depict it as dominated by NATO powers. The Soviet Union may also have been irritated by the significant part played by Canada in the Disarmament Commission last week.[13] In any event, the Soviet position on the inclusion of Canadian troops found no support either from members of the Council, or the Secretary-General, or the African members who participated in the debate. The silence of the Congolese representative seems particularly significant.

SOVIET ATTITUDE TO HAMMARSKJÖLD AND UN

1. In my Despatch 887 August 22† I discussed this subject at length. I do not repeat not think Soviet government is trying to force Hammarskjöld out of office at this time. My Indian, American. French and UK colleagues agree with me about this. It is probably true that Soviet leaders do not repeat not like Hammarskjöld's imaginative concept of role of UN and particularly his readiness to take responsibility and conduct an operation of magnitude involved in military and economic aid programme necessary for salvation of Congo. The Soviets prefer working on a bilateral basis in order to extract maximum amount of political advantage. Hence their opposition to Hammarskjöld's proposal for an economic mission to Congo. The Soviet attitude to the whole UN operation in Congo will be more apparent when the time comes for member nations to make contributions to it. It may well be that Soviet government though not repeat not now trying to force Hammarskjöld out of office [will] oppose any attempt to reappoint him for a further term but conditions may change before this question becomes urgent.

2. Most colleagues with whom I have spoken agree that Soviets fully realize that its influence in UN is likely to increase with admission of many countries with neutralist policies. Therefore in long run Soviet government will not repeat not want to weaken authority of UN. The Congo however is a special case. The Soviet government is most anxious to preserve authority of a leader such as Lumumba who if not repeat not a communist is now more [sympathetic?] to east than west as against Tshombe who has Belgian and some western support as well. If Soviet government succeeds in having Lumumba's authority restored in whole of Congo and Belgian and Western influence substantially reduced then its attitude towards Hammarskjöld and UN may well change.

3. Quite apart from considerations mentioned in foregoing paragraphs I think that campaign against Hammarskjöld and UN will diminish. Soviet leaders are aware that their campaign does not repeat not [group corrupt] support of other African states with exception of Guinea. Again Mr. Nehru's powerful public support for Hammarskjöld and his helpful action in making Dayal available to him must have some influence here.

[13] Voir/See document 93.

4. It is worthwhile noting that Soviet words in and out of Security Council have been more extreme than Soviet action in first three meetings of Security Council about Congo when Soviet representative did not repeat not veto moderate resolution. This course seems to have been followed at August 21 meeting of Security Council when Soviet representative allowed proceedings to end with for practical purposes an endorsement of Hammarskjöld.

5. As further evidence of this moderate attitude Gromyko told a colleague at reception yesterday that he was reasonably satisfied with the outcome of Security Council meetings. Lumumba no repeat no doubt on Soviet advice is reported to have said about the same thing in Leopoldville.

GHANAIAN REQUESTS FOR CANADIAN ASSISTANCE IN TRAINING CONGOLESE FORCE PUBLIQUE AND POLICE

Set out below is text of a message from the Prime Minister which we would be grateful if you would deliver, personally if possible, to President Nkrumah. As you will have seen from various messages referred to you, when the two requests were received from Dr. Nkrumah, they were considered, firstly, in the light of the desirability of placing any aid of this type in a United Nations context and, secondly, in the light of misgivings regarding Ghana's role in the Congo. Subsequently, Mr. Hammarskjöld sent a personal message to the Prime Minister asking for Canadian military training personnel to work under U.N. auspices in training the Congolese security forces. It developed that Hammarskjöld had sent his message on learning in Accra of the Ghanaian proposal and that he had obviously moved to overtake Nkrumah's approach. Although there has been an apparent settling down of Ghanaian Congo policy, and although the government would have liked to co-operate with Nkrumah if possible, it is the government's view that as a matter of policy all Canadian government-sponsored participation in the Congo operation should be under the aegis of the United Nations.

Text Begins. "I refer to your messages concerning the assistance of Canadian military personnel in training Congolese cadets as officers for the Force Publique and of Canadian police in training the Congolese police. The provision of adequate training for the Congolese Force Publique is doubtless an important part of the United Nations longer-term objectives in the Congo. Your invitation to participate with Ghana in this phase of assistance to the Congo is warmly appreciated.

The Canadian government attaches the highest importance to the restoration of stable and peaceful conditions in the Republic of the Congo and to this end is supporting fully and participating in the United Nations operation in that country. We have come to the decision that the aid which we are able to make available in this respect should be placed at the disposal of the United Nations to be used pursuant to the resolution of the Security Council and in accordance with the priorities established by the United Nations.

In the circumstances I regret that we are unable to respond positively in this matter. I am sure I can rely on your understanding of the considerations which have led us to take the position that our aid in support of peace and stability in the Congo should be channelled through the United Nations.

I have just received your most interesting letter on the general subject of aid to the Congo in the context of African interests and political developments and I shall be sending you my own views on these important matters in a further message. John G. Diefenbaker"

Emergency from Wood

UN Headquarters reports that when US Globemaster carrying Canadian UN army personnel arrived Stanleyville today it was attacked by Congolese army units. Canadians were arrested and some reported seriously injured. US crew also attacked and three of them are in Congolese hands. Ethiopian UN forces reported in clashes with Congolese army and trying to effect release of Canadians. Other reports from Stanleyville say Congo army entered UN headquarters there and carried off some UN personnel. Situation seems to be completely out of hand.

Lumumba left for Stanleyville this morning but had not arrived before the incidents occurred. Bunche is protesting today to Congolese Foreign Minister. Unless otherwise instructed I shall make verbal protest to Foreign Minister Bomboko whom I have already met.

I shall be with GC Carr when he talks to AC Carpenter at Trenton this evening.

NEW INCIDENT INVOLVING CANADIAN SERVICE PERSONNEL IN THE CONGO

Following confirms teleconference dictated message:

We have just received disconcerting news concerning another incident involving Canadian service personnel in the Congo.

2. Our representative in Leopoldville and Mr. Bunche on behalf of the UN have already made verbal protests as you know to the Congolese government.

3. This new incident following closely statements made by Lumumba that earlier difficulties were due to misunderstandings and did not represent Congolese policy must be considered by the Canadian government and indeed by the other governments participating in the UN operation, as raising most serious issues as regards the future of the UN force itself and, even, relations between the UN and the Congolese State.

4. It will be impossible for Canadian civilian experts and Canadian service personnel performing non-combat duties to remain in the Congo unless their personal security can be ensured by UN Forces even, if necessary, against Congolese security elements, which cannot be presumed to be operating under instructions from their government in assaulting UN personnel.

5. In the circumstances, we suggest that the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee should consider at the earliest possible moment what steps (including adequate arrangements at airports), can be taken by the UN military commander to ensure the security of UN personnel generally within the Congo. If it should transpire that UN forces cannot be allowed to operate by the Congolese authorities in such a way that minimum security is provided to UN personnel the whole problem of continued UN operations in the Congo will have to be considered by the Security Council.

6. While incidents are to be expected in the difficult circumstances now obtaining in the Congo further UN assistance can hardly be provided in a context where Congolese authorities appear to be unwilling or unable to allow the UN to duck attacks by Congolese forces against UN personnel.

CONGO: INCIDENT AT STANLEYVILLE

At the meeting of the Advisory Committee today the Secretary-General informed the group of the situation in Stanleyville insofar as it was known at that time. After some discussion of the serious nature of the situation and of possible approaches to its resolution and to preventing similar incidents from developing elsewhere, the Secretary-General said that he was addressing a message to the Heads of Governments of each of the nine African states with which the UN is dealing in this matter to acquaint them with the situation in Stanleyville and with its broader implications. The intention of this communication (which has since gone out) is to provide a basis for those Heads of Governments to give instructions to their foreign ministers now meeting in Leopoldville to exert moderating pressure on Lumumba. At the same time Bunche is under instructions to give a factual statement of the situation to the foreign ministers in Leopoldville.

2. We understand from Wieschhoff that unfortunately there is little grounds to hope that Lumumba will now be receptive to such moderate counsels. Secretariat assessment is that Lumumba's decision to go to Stanleyville himself (in an aircraft provided to him by USSR) seems to amount to an indication of non-confidence in the African meeting in Leopoldville. Wieschhoff also told us in strictest confidence that while the Secretary-General was unable to say so openly in response to questions raised at the Advisory Committee this morning, he is convinced that this morning's incident resulted from direct orders from Lumumba and that this action was taken in preparation for his visit. (The Secretary-General did say at this morning's meeting that he was convinced that the incident did not repeat not arise from instructions originating with the high command of the Congolese National Army from whom the UN commanders had been receiving sympathetic co-operation. He said that insofar as there was any influence other than lack of discipline of the Congo units and drunkenness and drug addiction, the incident had its origin in the political situation and the violent xenophobia which had developed.)

3. Several representatives notably Jha (India) said that the situation could not repeat not continue since it would call into question the efficacy of the whole operation of the UN in the Congo and that the time had come to be very firm with Lumumba. However no repeat no concrete ideas were expressed as to what form this firmness should take other than operating through the influence of the nine African states. There was discussion of the extent of organized (or disorganized) force the UN would have to face if it found itself having to enforce its will by strength of arms. Rikhye's answer to this question was far from precise since the situation varied from one part of the country to the other. The Secretary-General subsequently said that he did not repeat not doubt that the UN forces could bring the Congolese army under control but that to do so would change the whole character of the UN operation. In response to remarks from for example UAR, to the effect that the UN should not repeat not resort to force except in extremity the Secretary-General said that they would try to continue with their operation peacefully. The alternatives to such a course were disastrous.

4. He said that the Prime Minister had chosen to regard the UN force as a hostile element and for this reason he did not repeat not consider it would be helpful to follow a suggestion made by the representative of Liberia that the Congolese forces and the UN forces be integrated both to prevent hostility between the two groups and to provide training for the Congo army. (In this connection Rikhye had said that the Congolese government had requested assistance for the training of its army and both Ethiopian and the Mali representative said that this request should be followed up.

5. The Secretary-General said that the airport at Leopoldville was the lifeline of the UN operation both military and civil in the whole of the Congo and as such had to be controlled by the UN. He had learned that Lumumba had visited the airport yesterday and had in mind putting Congolese understudies in all positions connected with airport control with a view to taking over the control tower within a week. The Secretary-General said that such a development would endanger the whole operation.

6. I spoke from the text of your reference telegram, prefacing my statement with remarks to the effect that we were assuming that incidents such as that which had taken place today did not repeat not arise out of specific instructions from the Congo government but that if this were not repeat not the case the whole basis of the UN operation would have to be considered in the light of the new circumstances. In reply to my remarks, in particular about the necessity of making adequate arrangements at airports to ensure personal security of UN personnel, the Secretary-General said that we could be assured that the UN considered control of the airports to be essential and that if their ability to do so was called into question the issue would have to be returned to the Security Council. He went on to repeat what he had said at yesterday's Advisory Committee meeting to the effect that withdrawal of the UN force would recreate the vacuum which they had gone in to fill and that we would once again be faced with a situation which constituted a threat to international peace. The juxtaposition of this remark and my statement was perhaps unfortunate since I had not repeat not at any point suggested that the UN force be withdrawn.

7. Subsequently Weischhoff told me the Secretary-General had considered that on balance it was well that I had spoken as I had, since the remarks I made had to be made. Weischhoff went on to tell me that the UN fully recognized their responsibility to secure the airports and considered this a question of first priority even at the expense of letting other parts of the country go. To do this effectively on the scale now being implemented at Leopoldville airport would require about one thousand men for each airport. The resources of the force at the moment would not repeat not stretch that far and further troops might therefore be required. He told me that the UN troops and other sensitive areas and were in effect in battle posts behind mounted machine guns, etc.

8. With respect to the Canadians involved in the incident this morning you will by now have received Wood's telegram announcing his understanding that all Canadians in Stanleyville are now safe in UN hands and that a UN plane is going to Stanleyville tomorrow to bring out those who can be moved.[14] We had meanwhile received from USA Mission the names of two of the Canadians who have been rescued: these are Signalman A.L.G. Bone and Corporal G.B. Gravel.

MESSAGE FOR DR. NKRUMAH

Please deliver following message for President Nkrumah urgently and report reactions by Telegram. Begins.

My Dear President:

Your letter of August 12 reached me Thursday. It was good of you to set forth so fully and frankly your views on the problems facing all of us as a consequence of events in the Congo. I shall want to spend some time considering your opinions, and I know that you will then wish me to reply with equal candour.[15] In the meantime I want to comment on one particularly urgent aspect of the problem, which is pointed up by your observations and by events of the past few days.

Several times recently and again this weekend, among United Nations personnel in the Congo, Canadians have been the victims of violent and unprovoked attacks by elements of the Congolese armed forces.

The Congolese government has made clear its desire for the early departure of United Nations forces. Their departure, it seems to me, would lead to the subsequent withdrawal of civilian personnel serving under the aegis of the United Nations; member states would be reluctant to expose their civilian nationals to a situation in which even United Nations armed forces had not been safe from attack by the people they had come to help. Many member states might then, in such circumstances, be reluctant to furnish any form of aid for the Congo. In other words if the Congolese government is in fact seeking the rapid and complete elimination of the United Nations presence in the Congo, the consequence would be the reduction or elimination of United Nations assistance. I am deeply concerned about the effects of having such assistance diminished.

No further message from Diefenbaker to Nkrumah was found at Library and Archives Canada or the Diefenbaker Centre.

You have suggested that aid to the Congo might be channelled through the Independent African States. While I appreciate the importance of the role the Independent African States can play in this whole situation, I see difficulties in a single channel for aid through them. On the other hand I agree that it would be hard to make a case for insisting on a United Nations channel to the exclusion of all others. It was not your intention, I am sure, to suggest that any such regional grouping could, of its own resources and in the light of its own needs, furnish aid to the Congo on the scale required — in terms of trained and available manpower perhaps even more than in money and goods. By whatever channel or channels aid reaches the Congo, there is not in my opinion any real alternative at the present time to the United Nations presence in and assistance to the Congo.

I fear that the consequence of the withdrawal of the United Nations would be to make the Congo an object of great power rivalry and thus involve Africa directly in the Cold War. I am in full agreement with you that these results would be most regrettable; I do not see how they can be avoided if the Congo government succeeds in its apparent effort to jettison the United Nations.

That, in any case, is my assessment of the present trend — based on events and statements reported from the Congo and on Canadian reactions to them — and I am deeply disturbed by it.

I would ask you to give urgent consideration to these observations. If you should find yourself in at least some measure of agreement with me, I would ask you, further, to consider using your influence with the Congolese government, with a view to the elimination of incidents and the modification of those policies which are now rapidly alienating the Congo from the United Nations, with which its own future and the future of Africa must be so closely bound.

I am, yours sincerely, John G. Diefenbaker. Ends.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], September 2, 1960

CONGO — USE OF RCAF NORTH STAR AIRCRAFT

As you know, the Canadian Government previously authorized the use of four RCAF North Star aircraft for the carriage of equipment and supplies between Pisa and Leopoldville for a period of thirty days from July 21 in support of the U.N. operations in the Congo. Subsequently, the U.N. Secretariat agreed to the use of these aircraft for the top priority purpose of lifting Canadian Army signals unit personnel and equipment from Canada to the Congo. The operation is now completed with the last aircraft flight carrying the Canadian contingent to the Congo having left from Trenton last Tuesday, August 30. Further flights will be required, of course, to support the Canadian contingent and the Secretary-General's authority has already been sought for a maximum of two support flights per week, starting at the rate of two flights per month. The first flight is scheduled for September 7.

At Ministerial direction, informal consultations were held with the U.N. Secretariat on the subject of future United Nations' requirements for the use of RCAF aircraft for external air lifting to the Congo. Following these discussions, the Secretary-General has now formally requested that Canada assist the U.N. Congo operations by providing two North Star aircraft flights each week from Pisa to Leopoldville and return for an indefinite period. He has asked if the first aircraft could be made available in Pisa to commence flights on September 9.

I have ascertained that the Minister of National Defence is prepared, subject to your approval, to comply with the Secretary-General's request for two flights per week from Pisa to Leopoldville, over and above the service flights which will be required to support the Canadian contingent in the Congo.[16]

I should be grateful to know if you concur in the above-outlined arrangements. An urgent decision is required in order to enable the first aircraft to reach Pisa by September 9.

Our inclination would be to accept the Secretary-General's request, but for a limited period, possibly 60 or 90 days, at which time the arrangements would be subject to review in the light of developments.[17]

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL AID TO THE REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO

In a report to the Security Council dated September 7,[18] the Secretary-General of the United Nations urgently recommended to the Security Council the establishment of a fund for the Congo in the amount of $100 million. The purpose of this fund was to provide immediate financial assistance on a large scale for the re-establishment of a stable administration and internal security and restoring the normal economic life of the country.

2. The current situation is extremely delicate and further deterioration may be prevented only if the United Nations is put in a position to render substantial material support to the Congolese economy. The alternative is to leave the Congo exposed to direct assistance from opposing sides in the cold war, with all the risks and dangers which that course would involve. The situation is quite comparable to the one in Korea and perhaps in the broader context of African affairs, the stakes may be even higher. Certainly, without the financial assistance requested by Arrangement extended from Sept. 9 for 90 days, i.e. to Dec. 9/60. These flights are also being used for logistic support to Canadian contingent in ONUC, as per R.B.B.'s note. W.H. B[arton].

the Secretary-General the United Nations influence and effort in the Congo are likely to collapse. Coupled with the threat posed by the Soviet proposal for paralyzing the office of the Secretary-General, these are strong political reasons for giving the United Nations effective material support at this time.

3. In making his recommendation, the Secretary-General emphasized that this financial assistance was not designed to set up a permanent régime of external subsidy to the Congo; it was put forward with the expectation and intention that the Republic should be able to pay its own way both currently and for development purposes in the near future.

4. On September 20 the Secretary-General's recommendation was approved by a vote of 70 in favour, none against and 11 abstentions at the fourth emergency session of the United Nations General Assembly. The following day the Secretary-General sent a note to the Secretary of State for External Affairs† requesting that Canada give urgent consideration to contributing to the United Nations fund for the Congo, in line with the General Assembly's resolution. The Secretary-General has made a similar appeal to all other member governments.

5. In his speech of September 22,[19] President Eisenhower indicated strong United States support for the Congo fund. The President's declaration of support was given precision by a letter from the Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Herter, to the Secretary-General[20] upon presentation of a cheque for $5 million as a United States contribution to the Congo fund. This was in addition to an earlier contribution of $5 million made by the United States to enable the Congo to maintain essential imports. Mr. Herter said, in part, that the $10 million contribution was made on the assumption that contributions would also be forthcoming from other governments. Existing legislation under which funds are now available to the United States Government provides that such contributions will not exceed 40 per cent of the total made available to the United Nations. From other sources there is an indication that the United States is prepared to make a total of $40 million available on a 40 per cent matching basis.

6. In his speech in the General Debate at the General Assembly,[21] the Prime Minister acknowledged that one of the large tasks of the Assembly was to ensure that sufficient support is forthcoming to sustain the United Nations in its efforts to revive the economic and financial life of the Congo. He assured the Assembly that Canada would assume an equitable share of this burden.

7. In making its assessment as to the level of Canadian support for United Nations voluntary programmes, Canada has in the past been guided by its percentage share of the regular United Nations budget. This share is at present 3.11 per cent. Another factor in the calculation is that the less-developed countries with a low per capita annual income cannot be expected to contribute with much generosity to the voluntary programmes of the United Nations; the burden thus falls on the more advanced economies. With this in mind, the Canadian contribution to the $100 million target for the Special Fund and the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance was $4 million or 4 per cent of the total.

8. So far, apart from the United States contribution, contributions have been announced by Prime Minister Nash of New Zealand in the amount of $280,000 and Mr. Luns, the Netherlands Foreign Minister, in the amount of $1 million. These announcements are heartening indications of support for the Secretary-General's appeal from two smaller countries which have always shown themselves ready to give substantial assistance to United Nations programmes and activities.

Recommendation

9. I recommend, therefore, that approval be given:

(a) for a Canadian pledge to the United Nations Fund for the Congo in the amount of $1 million to be announced at the General Assembly;

(b) that the question of a further Canadian contribution to the Fund be kept under active review, with particular reference to the manner in which the Fund is being applied in the Congo and the response to the Secretary-General's appeal of other states.[22]

FINANCING OF UNEF AND ONUC

The apportionment among member states of the costs of UNEF and ONUC (UN military operations in the Congo) is one of the more important issues facing the Assembly.

2. Final cost estimates of ONUC depend on negotiations with African troop-supplying governments, which are apparently requesting per diem allowances as high as those received by Swedish troops. If these high allowances are paid generally, the costs of ONUC might exceed the maximum estimates contained [in] our telegram 1706 October 7† ($45 million in 1960 and $90 million for 1961).

3. We have exchanged views with members of USA and UK delegations. There follows a preliminary assessment of the financing problem.

4. Judging from experience with UNEF it will be very difficult to persuade most of the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America to contribute to the costs of ONUC on the basis of the regular scale of assessments. (None here seem to doubt that USSR will refuse to pay anything, even for costs incurred before USSR became dissatisfied with UN actions in Congo.) In the first place the Asians, Africans and Latins will be influenced by the financial implications. The costs of UN peace-keeping operations are now running at an annual rate of over 20 million dollars for UNEF and about 90 million for ONUC. Moreover judging from the experience of UNEF, once an emergency force is established it seems to be maintained in the area indefinitely. It follows that the present costs of UN peace-keeping operations are unlikely to be reduced in future years; rather such costs are more likely to increase as more emergency forces are established without reducing or removing those already in existence. The vast majority of member states will therefore be understandably reluctant for purely financial reasons to accept the principle that the ever-increasing costs of these operations should be financed from the regular budget.

5. Many member states, particularly recipients of economic aid, firmly believe that the rich developed countries or the permanent members of the Security Council should pay the costs of peace and security and that the responsibility of other member states should be limited to the provision of troops, the costs of which are not repeat not fully reimbursed. In the case of the Congo, they might argue that Belgium should pay or that the Congo should reimburse the UN at a later date.

6. There appears to be a good possibility therefore that the financial support for ONUC will be even less widespread than the financial support for UNEF; moreover if the costs of UNEF and ONUC are ever covered it will probably be mainly by USA and to a lesser extent UK and perhaps also Belgium. Such a situation might undermine the prestige and collective authority of UN and lend support to the repeated Soviet contention in the 5th Committee and elsewhere that UN is acting as an arm of NATO.

7. We are not repeat not hopeful that this unsatisfactory situation can be avoided. However, we have been discussing two possible approaches that might secure a somewhat broader financial support for UNEF and ONUC. Mr. Bender the Chief USA Adviser of the 5th Committee, believes strongly that if UNEF could be reduced in size beginning in 1961 it would be possible to argue more convincingly that UN emergency forces are not repeat not permanent institutions and that consequently there is a good possibility that the costs of UN peace-keeping operations will stabilize at an acceptable level (at the same time all efforts should be made to reduce the size of ONUC in 1961. Bender quoted a target of $50 million for both ONUC and UNEF in 1961.) There are also the views that if UNEF is not repeat not reduced this year it will not repeat not be for many years to come; and that this is a good year to tell the disputants that the high costs of UN peace-keeping operations are threatening the collective strength of UN at a time when USSR is with some success attempting to weaken the organization.

8. Bender said the Secretariat's reaction to his proposal was neither completely negative nor positive. The Secretariat would prefer complete removal of UNEF and substitution of an observer group rather than reduction of UNEF;[23] they adduce familiar argument that [a] reduced force could not repeat not prevent increase in border incidents which would damage UN prestige. In the end however Secretariat may accept reduction or removal of UNEF if it becomes convinced that otherwise broad or sufficient financial support for both UNEF and ONUC can not repeat not be forthcoming.

9. Another approach would be for countries contributing troops to UNEF and ONUC to launch an extensive lobbying campaign to persuade middle and small powers that this year more than ever before it is to their interest to support the principle of collective responsibility.[24] It could be pointed out that they are increasingly looking to UN support and assistance not repeat not only for economic development but also in the field of peace and security. It could be argued that it is essential to finance the costs of peace and security from a section of the regular budget according to the regular scale of assessment and avoid the present situation in which UN cannot repeat not pay its bills and must limp from financial crisis to financial crisis. Such steps would promote the objective of increase UN prestige, influence and effectiveness at a time when USSR is working the opposite direction.

10. For his part Bender has concluded that it is unrealistic to expect most of the states of Asia, Africa and Latin America to contribute to ONUC according to the regular scale of assessments. He believes that the troop contributing countries should be persuaded to introduce a resolution according to which ONUC would be financed as UNEF was financed in 1960 with a further 25 percent rebate for troop-supplying countries. The hope of course would be that capital exporting countries would reject the rebates. Bender believed it would still be possible to have ONUC costs appear in a section of the regular budget. There is an opposing view in USA delegation at lower levels that concessions made last year for UNEF without substantial results should not repeat not be repeated for ONUC and that strong pressure should be brought to finance ONUC according to the regular scale. Bender put his case to Washington some time ago but there has been no repeat no reply.

11. We learned with interest that Bender does not repeat not really believe in the principle of collective responsibility. He believes that according to UN Charter the big powers do have a special responsibility for keeping the peace. This view may be shared by others in Washington, though presumably not repeat not by USA Treasury. Bender has also requested Washington's attitude on reducing UNEF. So far no repeat no reply except to the effect that USA missions in the area are expected to be opposed.

12. UK delegation is reporting to London on the above matters. UK Treasury man here of course favours the financing of ONUC according to the regular scale of assessments.

13. ONUC costs for 1960 will be considered sometime after October 30 and costs for 1961 will be dealt with at a much later date (conceivably after Christmas) when the political situation in Congo may be more clear. The 1961 costs may be financed differently from the 1960 costs.

[14.] We believe that our eventual position on the 1960 and 1961 costs should be considered in the light inter alia of: (a) whether UNEF can be reduced in 1961; (b) the size of ONUC estimates for 1961 which in turn depends on the Congo political situation; (c) the true strength of extent to which the Asian and African delegations can be convinced that the success of the Congo operation will depend on the principle of collective responsibility; and (d) the decisions which will eventually flow from Washington. Meanwhile in private discussions with USA, UK, Sweden, Norway and Denmark we are urging, on the basis of past instructions on UNEF, that strong efforts be made to finance ONUC according to the regular scale and that concessions should be introduced only as a last resort.[25] We are also seeking to sound out key Asian, African and Latin American delegations on this issue. Bender apparently wants troop-supplying countries, particularly Canada, to take the initiative.

[15.] You may wish to consider discreet soundings in Washington, taking care to protect our source and our good relations with Bender.

DESPATCH NO. 80 Leopoldville, November 29, 1960
CONFIDENTIAL

THE CONGO AND THE COLD WAR

When the Congolese "force publique" mutinied on July 6 and over 50,000 Belgians left the country during the following weeks, it was generally considered imperative that the UN should fill the vacuum left by the Belgians to prevent the Congo becoming an ideological if not a real battleground in the cold war. The general thesis, supported by most western countries and the majority of African and Asian states, was that all aid should be channelled through the U.N. The Congolese government, then under the control of M. Lumumba, welcomed UN assistance but was not too keen on the idea that it should be exclusive. At the Pan-African Conference in Leopoldville the Congolese government took the view that UN aid should be Africanized as much as possible and that the Congo should also be free to accept bilateral aid. They were supported in this by some of their fellow Africans notably, Guinea, UAR and Morocco (and presumably by the Soviet and Czech Embassies behind the scenes). The reasons for this attitude were, I suspect, firstly that Lumumba was afraid that UN assistance by the nature of things would mean primarily Western assistance and secondly because he hoped that like Guinea, Ghana and the UAR, the Congo could accept aid from both sides and at the same time follow a policy of so-called positive neutralism. More recently, India and Yugoslavia have also seemed to take the view that the Congo should become a member of the growing neutral bloc.

2. The fallacy in this policy, it seems to me, is that the Congo, in its present state of development, is not really in the same position as the UAR, India, Guinea and Ghana. Those countries have an educated elite and a cadre of technicians amongst their own nationals. Thus, the proportion of foreign technicians they need in relation to the total number of technicians in the country is comparatively small (except perhaps in the case of Guinea). They can, therefore, accept technicians from both sides without fear of becoming involved in the cold war. The Congo on the other hand has very few technicians of her own. For some years to come the bulk of her engineers, doctors, accountants, etc. will be foreigners and their presence will have political consequences. If, for example, the Congo needs five thousand foreign technicians and takes half from the West and half from the Communist countries, this would be tantamount to turning the country into a cold war battleground. The only way she can avoid this is to take the great majority of them from one side or the other. Since it would hardly be politically feasible for her to opt for the East she has little alternative but to choose the bulk of her technicians from the West.

3. Even if the UN could provide the required number of technicians, which seems doubtful, the fact that these technicians were under UN auspices would not prevent a cold war atmosphere. The experience of the last few months in the Congo has, I think, demonstrated that the UN cannot fill a political vacuum. The vacuum created by the departure of the Soviet bloc embassies and technicians has for the most part been filled by the major western powers led by the U.S. Certain African and Asian countries have tried to step into the breach themselves hoping perhaps to exclude the cold war from the Congo and also to prevent the Congo from falling into the western orbit by default. But for the most part they have failed, at least in Leopoldville, firstly because they lacked the necessary economic resources, secondly because they were divided amongst themselves and finally because they chose as their instrument Lumumba whose policy of strong central rule was unacceptable to the majority of the country. As a result, the cold war is operating to some extent in the Congo at the present time. In Stanleyville and throughout the Eastern province agents from the UAR are reported to be spending vast sums of money all of which may not originate in Cairo, to bolster Lumumba's followers and apparently their efforts have met with considerable success.

4. Although the problem has perhaps been oversimplified in this despatch the main points, I think, are valid: Firstly, that despite the presence of the UN, the cold war is operating in the Congo; secondly, that to avoid becoming a virtual cockpit of East-West and inter-African rivalry, the Congo must elect to take the bulk of her technicians from one side or the other, presumably the West. This would not mean, of course, that the Congo would not follow a neutral or African foreign policy but it would at least mean that her economic, political and judicial philosophy over the next few years would be closer to Western ideals.

FINANCING OF THE UNITED NATIONS
CONGO OPERATION

In putting forward his supplementary estimates to the General Assembly, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Hammarskjöld, estimated that a sum of $66.6 million would be required to finance the United Nations Congo operation for the six months period ending in December of this year. In putting forward his estimates, the Secretary-General expressed the hope that those countries which had provided services of various kinds, such as the initial airlift of troops, might be willing to forego payment. The United States Government has already responded to the Secretary-General's request and has informed him that it was willing to absorb costs of airlifting troops to the Congo in the amount of $12 million.

2. The Budgetary Committee of the Assembly is currently meeting to consider the financing of the Congo operation. On the basis of the reports of the Canadian Delegation, it is evident that in order to achieve substantial support for the payment of the Congo operation costs by the membership of the United Nations at large, the total amount to be paid will have to be reduced as much as possible. Furthermore, a formula will have to be found by which the share of this year's unprecedented costs to be paid by the members of the Organization in the category of under-developed countries are reduced. Unless the resolution providing for the financing of the Congo costs contains these two elements, the fundamental principle that the costs of the United Nations undertakings must be paid for by the membership at large is in grave danger of being lost.

3. Our Delegation has informed me that the United Kingdom Delegation has approached them urgently on the question of whether Canada is prepared to absorb the initial airlift costs of the Canadian contingent amounting to approximately $600,000 as was suggested by the Secretary-General to all members having incurred such costs. The United Kingdom representatives have told our Delegation that they had authority to announce the absorption by the United Kingdom of airlift costs in the amount, approximately, of $500,000 if Canada was prepared to do likewise, since the United Kingdom did not wish to be the only country, apart from the United States, making a gesture of this kind.

4. It is essential that a generally agreed basis is found for the allocation among the member states of the United Nations of the costs of the Congo operation. This year, when the Organization is facing its severest test since the Korean War, it is particularly necessary that those countries who are in a position to do so, to assist the United Nations in every way possible so that lack of the means does not become an impediment to the discharge of the essential peace-keeping functions of the Organization.

Recommendation

Accordingly, I recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, that approval be given for the absorption by Canada of the costs of the initial airlift of the Canadian contingent to the Congo in the amount, approximately, of $600,000 and that the Delegation be authorized to announce this decision at an appropriate time during the current debate on the financing of the United Nations Congo operation.

FINANCING U.N. OPERATIONS IN THE CONGO

I have secured this morning the approval of the Prime Minister and the majority of the Ministers who were at the Treasury Board to proceeding with the proposal in the memorandum on this subject of November 29th.

Mr. Fleming had some reservations about the matter which he expressed, but his colleagues at the Treasury Board felt we should go ahead nevertheless. As the Prime Minister was now satisfied with the fairness and necessity of this operation, he wishes you to inform our delegation at the United Nations to indicate our intention to absorb the costs of the initial air lift as proposed in the memorandum.

You may therefore take this as your authorization to inform the delegation to this effect.[28]

CONGO TRENDS

We have been studying several recent appreciations of the situation in the Congo, most of which are available to you. We are concerned by a number of apparent possibilities. Some of these are listed in the following paragraphs.

2. Before putting our appreciation to ministers I should like to know how you see similar possibilities. It would be useful as well if you would discuss the developing situation with the Secretary-General, in an effort to learn how he assesses it and the prospects facing the UN.

3. It would seem that in some ways the de facto Congo situation may be moving in the direction of greater stability, Kasavubu's position having been clearly strengthened by his success in New York, for example, and Mobutu's by the ANC parade by his more or less successful trial of strength in the Welbeck Affair[29] and the capture of Lumumba.[30] The communist powers remain on the outside, Ghana and the UAR have suffered serious setbacks in the mischievous policies they were pursuing, sentiment against the Belgians may be decreasing somewhat or is not now increasing, and there are some indications that agreement might be reached between Kasavubu and Tshombe, on some sort of federal structure.

4. Parallel with these developments there seems to have been a marked decrease in UN prestige and influence. Positions taken by the UN in the Congo under the leadership of Dayal and Rikhye have incensed Mobutu, who may also have been under the influence of anti-UN advice from Belgian experts and administrators. The result has been rash anti-UN demonstrations and a lowering of UN prestige in the eyes of the Congolese. This weakening of the UN in the Congo, or at least in Leopoldville, may have been part of the price paid for building up Kasavubu and Mobutu. Although we welcome the trend toward stability, occasioned by the ascendancy of Kasavubu and Mobutu, we are disturbed that they have fallen out with the UN in the process.

5. If the present trend continued and culminated in the establishment of a firm and undeniably legitimate government in Leopoldville, the UN might be able on its own initiative to withdraw its forces; alternatively this same development might well lead to pressures for early withdrawal which could not and probably should not be resisted.

6. Apart from the damage to UN prestige, in Africa especially, the problems confronting the Congo, in the absence of a UN military presence, would be of very great magnitude. Even if no new forces appeared on the scene, warlike tribal elements and secessionist provincial authorities are quite capable of keeping the Congo in perpetual civil war. Whether the Congo's economic problems could be tackled effectively in these circumstances, moreover, even by the UN working from the outside, seems highly questionable. The departure of the UN from the Congo, moreover, might lead to a new exodus of Belgians and a new wave of chaos in the Congolese administration.

7. While we are concerned to maintain UN prestige, it is also recalled that we supported the UN action with the object of maintaining peace and security and, by the same token, forestalling communist intervention. It seems to us that the dangers of full-scale civil war, with the attendant likelihood of communist intervention in some form, may have been increased by recent events. If Gizenga and General Lundula set up a rival régime in Stanleyville, it would appear that they might obtain military support from any or all of the UAR, Ghana, Mali and Morocco. (Ghana's proposal of a unified African command may have some significance in this context.) From the Soviet bloc such a régime could at the least obtain important aid in material and in technical personnel, with significant military aid or outright military intervention by no means ruled out.

8. Another and closely related concern is the position of Belgium. It would seem to us that Belgian personnel in large numbers are needed to ensure that the Congo's basic economic and administrative problems are tackled effectively. But the extremely unsatisfactory state of Belgian-UN relations, and the unpopularity of Belgium with a large portion of the UN membership, present formidable obstacles. It would also seem that Belgium's insistence on its right to aid the Congo unilaterally, by private arrangement with any Congolese authority it chooses to recognize, and its continued support of a secessionist régime, constitute an open invitation to the communist powers to intervene whenever they may wish to do so.

9. As you know, the Minister stated on November 27 in answer to a question in the House: "I do not think there is any prospect certainly in the immediate future of the troops (Canadian) being withdrawn from the Congo." It is nonetheless desirable to put before the Minister an up-to-date assessment of possible trends in order to provide a background against which he can judge both current and possible future requests from the UN for assistance. I leave it to your judgment to decide how and when to approach the Secretary-General but your early comments on the various issues raised in this telegram would be most helpful.[31]

CONGO TRENDS

I was grateful to receive your valuable analysis of the present situation in the Congo with which I am in substantial agreement, although developments since your message was despatched have added further complications to the situation.

2. I would agree with paragraph 3 of your message that the de facto Congo situation may be moving in the direction of greater stability in the sense that it appears that the Kasavubu-Mobutu combination have strengthened their control over the Congolese National Army and are more firmly installed in Leopoldville. It remains to be seen whether they can impose their authority in other parts of the country and there may soon be a trial of strength over the situation in Stanleyville. Moreover, this new acquisition of authority by the Congolese Government seems to be combined with a somewhat heady sense of their own power.

3. This brings me to paragraph 4 of your reference telegram and the increasingly bad relations between the Congolese authorities and UN demonstrated by the Congolese attitude to the UN force, and most recently by Congolese interference with UN transport facilities and control at the airports. This obviously represents a potentially dangerous situation which could jeopardize the security of the UN including Canadian troops. When I discussed relations between UN command and the Congolese authorities with Cordier on December 7, he said that these relations were "on a slippery slope." He said he would give me a report in a day or two of the various forms of interference by the Congolese authorities with the activities of the UN force. It may be, of course, that all the faults are not repeat not on one side, and in particular that the Secretary-General's representative Dayal has not repeat not inspired confidence in the Congolese Government.[32] It seems essential, however, from the point of view of the security of the force and indeed the continued operation of the UN in the Congo that some positive attempt should be made to improve relations between the Congolese authorities and the UN command. I spoke to Pedersen of USA delegation on this subject yesterday and he said that he entirely agreed with me. Perhaps the Americans may have some influence with President Kasavubu, which might lead to improvement. Certainly the Belgians appear to have plenty of influence with President Kasavubu and Colonel Mobutu. It strikes one as an extraordinary situation that while the Belgians appear to be anxious for the continued presence of the UN force in the Congo for the protection of their nationals, they do not repeat not appear to exert any influence to restrain their Congolese friends from interference with UN operation.

4. In paragraph 5 of your reference telegram, you refer to the possibility of the establishment of an "undeniably legitimate government" in Leopoldville which might lead to the withdrawal of UN forces. This would, of course, be a highly desirable development but I need not repeat not emphasize that at the present time many African and Asian governments (in addition to the

Also that Dayal and Rikhye may be exaggerating? [J.H. Taylor]

Communist bloc) totally deny the legitimacy of the present régime in Leopoldville and demand that the UN should take measures to restore "legitimacy" by summoning Parliament and extruding the "dictatorship" of Mobotu. When I spoke to Cordier on this aspect of the matter, he said that in his view Kasavubu had made a great error in not repeat not following up his appointment of Ileo as Prime Minister and installing a legitimate government which, in due course, might have obtained the support of Parliament.[33] He considered that the continuation of the Commissioner system of government and Mobutu's personal authority were unconstitutional.

5. With regard to the possibility of UN withdrawal, Cordier was emphatic that such a withdrawal at the present time would lead to bloody civil war in the Congo accompanied by intervention from neighbouring African states and the eventual threat of international complications of the kind which UN intervention had, in the first place, been designed to prevent. Both the Secretary-General and Cordier have also stated most emphatically (although not repeat not, I think, publicly) that the withdrawal of the UN force would make it totally impossible to implement any UN programme of technical assistance or economical aid to the Congo as a resultant situation would be too chaotic to enable such a programme to be implemented.

6. I agree with the estimate in paragraph 7 of your reference telegram that there is a danger of the establishment of a rival pro-communist régime in Stanleyville, indeed this danger is very apparent at the present time. Many of my colleagues with whom I have discussed developments in the Congo believe that its eventual fate may be partition with Katanga virtually independent, Leopoldville under Kasavubu, and the Stanleyville area ruled by the supporters of Lumumba. In commenting on this possibility Cordier pointed out that in his view this would not repeat not be a static division but conditions of warfare between the different areas would prevail.

7. As you have pointed out in paragraph 4 of your reference telegram, the decrease in the prestige and authority of the UN arising out of the present situation in the Congo is most marked. While UN intervention succeeded both in removing Belgian military forces from the Congo and in defeating direct Soviet intervention there, the cost in terms of UN authority has been terribly heavy. Indeed the UN and the Secretary-General are now being attacked from many directions simultaneously. While the Russians accuse them of encouraging the "dictatorship" of Mobotu, the Mobotu régime accuse them of favouring Lumumba. The Belgians, while demanding protection for their nationals, accuse the UN of impeding much needed Belgian technical assistance. Ghana, UAR, Morocco, India, Ceylon, Indonesia, Guinea, Mali and many other members of the Afro-Asian bloc, accuse the UN command and indirectly the Secretary-General of frustrating UN purposes in the Congo by dealing with the Mobotu régime and tolerating the arrest of Lumumba. Meanwhile, many UN members of all political persuasions refuse to pay their fair share of the financial burden of the UN force, most recently the force itself is being threatened with withdrawals, so far by governments making a somewhat nominal contribution in terms of numbers, but there are indications that Indonesia, Morocco, and perhaps others may be reviewing their commitments to maintain forces in the Congo. In the face of all opposition and criticism, the Secretary-General maintains his determination that UN force should remain but we must face the possibility that a combination of circumstances might make this increasingly difficult. In any event it is essential, for the future authority of the UN, that when the force does leave the Congo, it should not repeat not do so in circumstances of humiliating failure but with dignity and leaving behind it some semblance of stable government.

Did not Mobutu's initiative frustrate this? [J.H. Taylor]

8. It may be that the only eventual solution of the Congo question will have to come about as a result of negotiations between the Great Powers and that the Congo, like disarmament and Berlin, will remain an intractable problem until such negotiations can take place. Even assuming, and it is a large assumption, that a successful negotiation (perhaps on the basis of an agreement on non-intervention by the Great Powers) could take place, it is not repeat not likely to do so before the new USA administration is firmly installed. Meanwhile, there will be anxious months ahead in the Congo. I feel I should draw your attention in particular to the problem of the security of the UN forces and of the Canadian contingent. Unless relations can be improved between the Congolese government and the UN forces, there is a continuing danger that UN forces including the Canadians may be exposed to physical danger, and if control of the airports is lost, to the possibility of being trapped in different areas of the Congo. It is my recommendation that in these circumstances we should raise the question of the security of UN forces either by an intervention in the Secretary-General's Advisory Committee or directly with the Secretary-General. I also venture to suggest that this whole problem should be discussed with the State Department with a view to the USA exercising any influence they possess over the Congolese authorities.

9. I fear that this a pessimistic picture, I hope over pessimistic. I shall seek an early opportunity as you suggest to discuss these problems with the Secretary-General. This has been difficult in recent days owing to the many pressures upon his time. Meanwhile, events both in the Congo itself and in the discussion of the Congo in the Security Council are moving fast and I should be grateful for your views and instructions.

CONGO TRENDS

The thoughtful assessment in your reference telegram is much appreciated.

2. Instructions for representations about the safety of Canadian and other UN forces in the Congo were contained in our telegram K-439 of December 9, which crossed your 2578.

3. Your proposal that the USA be asked to use its influence over the Congo authorities, Leopoldville, is now being carefully studied, with a view to its early implementation, if approved.

4. In the meantime, it may be useful to you to have an indication of some of the considerations which are being taken into account in Ottawa in determining the Canadian attitude towards these matters.

(1) We continue to believe that peaceful and stable conditions are an essential requirement if the UN is to be enabled to set the Congo on a course of economic and social improvement and development.

(2) We continue to believe it essential that the efforts of the United Nations forces in the Congo to achieve these conditions of peace and stability, in accordance with the directives of the Security Council, should not be allowed to fail; such failure would not only be tragic in itself but could dangerously weaken the authority and prestige of the UN in all spheres. In this connection we deplore intemperate attacks upon the UN and its officials — from whatever side those attacks may come — the placing of obstacles in the way of the UN and the current and alarming tendency of some members to dissociate themselves from the UN effort, by withdrawing national contingents or by withholding needed financial support.

(3) Canada maintains its determination to keep at the UN's disposal the small contingent of service specialists which it has been called upon to supply.

(4) Canada has sought and will continue to seek assurances that UN forces, including the Canadian contingent, are not exposed to unnecessary risks, and that all reasonable measures are taken for their protection. Beyond this, Canada does not consider it proper to intervene in the conduct of the UN operation.

CONGO: CANADIAN VIEWS ABOUT CURRENT UN OPERATIONS

The appointment of the new Force commander has provided an opportunity for reviewing the UN operations in the Congo, especially on the military side. It may be of some assistance to the Secretary-General, prior to his visit next week to the Congo, to express some Canadian views about the way in which the UN effort appears to be developing at the present time. The Secretary-General should understand, however, that our only concern is about improving the operations and strengthening the UN authority in the Congo. We have no wish to add to his burdens by joining the chorus of complaint and criticism. Quite apart from the severe pressure under which the Secretary-General has been working lately, he would naturally resent further criticism of his direction of UN affairs in the Congo and especially of appointments which he might have made to the UN headquarters there.

2. Our worries about the UN operations fall into two main categories: (a) those of a general political nature in which Canada has a broad interest as a firm supporter of the UN; and (b) those of a technical nature in which Canada's interest is direct because of its participation in the Force. Many of these worries are based on the de-briefing reports which Canadian officers, who have served in the Congo Force, have made on their return to Canada. While some of the matters may lie beyond the scope of the immediate interest and responsibility of those officers, others having to do with military organization and the direction of the Force in the Congo are matters in which Canadian military authorities can legitimately interest themselves. The various questions are summarized in the following paragraphs.

3. The most recent Assembly debate on the Congo served to underscore the sharp division in the UN between supporters of Kasavubu and Mobutu and those who favour Lumumba. This political division has been reflected further in the announcement of various governments that they would withdraw their contingents and in the attitude of various officers, military and civilian, in the UN Congo command. The division undoubtedly adds greatly to the difficulties in giving cohesive direction to the Force and reduces the influence of the UN in the area. This is no doubt fully appreciated by the Secretary-General but we would be interested to learn whether he has any suggestions for resolving or reducing the differences among the UN members. It might help, for example, to step up diplomatic activities outside the UN among governments closely connected with Congo developments. Perhaps some of the problems can be usefully explored at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference.

4. Undoubtedly a significant source of UN weakness in the Congo has been the failure to develop effective co-operation between the UN command and the Congolese authorities. The UN has had to suffer the consequences and these could be most serious if, for example, the present Congolese authorities in Leopoldville were to engage in concerted efforts to hamper the UN operations. From the Canadian point of view, there appears to be every reason to try to persuade Kasavubu, Mobutu and their Belgian advisers to co-operate fully with the UN. This may be difficult because of the mutual distrust and dislike between the UN authorities in Leopoldville and the Congolese of the central government. It would seem most desirable, however, that the Secretary-General's representative and the force commander should evolve working relations with the recognized and de facto Congolese authorities in Leopoldville (especially Kasavubu and Mobutu). If this should require some change in the UN directorate there, presumably this step should be taken.

5. The Secretary-General may be well aware that serious confusion exists in the areas of responsibility and chain of command in Leopoldville and in the liaison between Leopoldville and New York. Notwithstanding the political and administrative complications, we should be able to speak to him freely, though in general terms, about the desirability of giving more precision to the Force commander's status and responsibilities not only vis-à-vis the Secretary-General but especially vis- à-vis the Secretary-General's representative in Leopoldville. We understand that relations between the civilian and the military side of the UN command have frequently been strained and that this has added to the confusion and conflict in the directives given to the force. The presence of Rikhye in the Congo and the predominance of Indian officers in the command staff have tended to push Von Horn and other senior military officers into the background from time to time. We believe that the appointment of the new commander provides [a] good opportunity, which should not be missed, to clarify the commander's terms of reference.

6. The political differences about the Congo within the UN membership and the threatened withdrawal of some national contingents may make it desirable to re-organize the command structure in Leopoldville, especially on the military side. The arrival of the new commander might provide sufficient reason for making some changes. The dissatisfaction of India about the way in which the Congo situation has been developing could lead to some withdrawal of Indian officers, although this would not be a desirable development from the UN point of view, if the withdrawal should be wholesale. We might enquire of the Secretary-General whether in the light of the political circumstances and as part of the rotation of national contingents, he might be considering some re-organization of the UN staff, both military and civilian. Quite obviously, however, any re-organization would have to be carried out gradually to avoid disruption.

7. We assume that the Secretary-General is still in consultation with the governments concerned about the status of those contingents which have been announced as being withdrawn from the Force. We wonder whether in the meantime those contingents are considered to be under UN command, whether they are taking orders from the UN commander or whether any steps are being taken to withdraw them. Our view is that the contingents have no status in the Congo except as part of the UN Force and that as long as they are there in that capacity, they should be under UN command. If these contingents are to remain in the Force, it would seem unwise to rely on them in sensitive areas and the Force commander should see that they were deployed so as to minimize their opportunities for making mischief. Of course, what should be avoided at all costs would be an outbreak of fighting which might find the UN Force divided against itself. If some contingents were actually to be withdrawn from the Congo, we wonder whether politically acceptable alternatives could be found. It would be most helpful to have the Secretary-General's views on the whole question of withdrawal.

8. Because of the complexity and danger in the prevailing situation in the Congo we consider it very desirable to try to ensure as far as possible that the UN Force will receive clear directives and orders from its commander. In the near future there may be many situations in which indecision and hesitation on the part of the force might lead to serious consequences in the Congo situation and also impair the welfare and safety of UN troops there. One specific suggestion we would make in this regard is that areas of responsibility and the chain of command in Leopoldville be clearly defined. Perhaps the most effective step which can be taken at this time of appointing a new commander would be to regularize his position as regards the Secretary-General's representative. Specifically we believe that the commander should have full control of all military matters and should be fully responsible for giving military advice to the Secretary-General's representative. In other words, the commander should be the clearly-appointed military adviser to Dayal. The Secretary-General's Military Adviser, on the other hand, has a role and function at UN Headquarters and he should, in the Canadian view, be located in New York. This is clearly a question of efficient organization and it is the firm opinion of the Canadian military authorities that the confusion in the directives given to the Force will not be removed unless and until the role and function of the commander is clarified in this way. We consider this to be the most important point in our approach to the Secretary-General at this time.

9. Our hope is that you can discuss this point and the others raised in this telegram with the Secretary-General in a friendly and frank way. We have purposely avoided references to personalities, because we realize that the Secretary-General would be reluctant to discuss the problems in terms of officers and officials, who may have been hand-picked by him. We are not unaware that in a situation as complicated politically as is the one the UN is facing in the Congo, it is not easy to find appropriate personnel for the various difficult jobs. Please have a discussion with the Secretary-General on the basis of the points made in this telegram, which you may use at your discretion.

CONGO: CANADIAN VIEWS ABOUT CURRENT UN OPERATIONS

In accordance with your instructions I saw the Secretary-General yesterday and began by raising with him the important point concerning the responsibility of the Congo commander-in-chief for military matters and for giving advice to the Secretary-General's representative as outlined in paragraph 8 of your reference telegram. I told the Secretary-General that I was sure that he would not repeat not mind my speaking to him quite frankly about the problems to do with the organization of UN Headquarters which were giving concern to us. I then outlined to him the view of the Canadian military authorities that the position of the new commander-in-chief should be regularized, that he should be fully responsible for giving advice to the Secretary-General's representative and should have full control of all military matters. I went on to say that we had been disturbed by evidence of confusion and conflict in the directives given to the Force and felt that this was partly attributable to the fact that the Secretary-General's military adviser should not repeat not be responsible for giving military advice to the Secretary-General's representative in the Congo as this should be the responsibility of the commander-in-chief. Hence in our view General Rikhye should return to New York where his proper role and function could be best exercised. The Secretary-General took these remarks in a friendly spirit. He acknowledged that the situation in the UN command in Leopoldville was far from satisfactory and that a clarification of the chain of command was needed. He said that he expected that the new commander-in-chief would have views on this subject and he would of course have to take these views into account. He went on to say that it had to be appreciated that the operation in the Congo was unique in that every aspect of the military operation had such marked political overtones. His great need therefore had been for a senior military officer who was capable of conducting delicate and difficult negotiations with various Congolese military and para-military elements both of the central government and of the provincial governments. General Rikhye had fulfilled this function on a number of critical occasions and as a practical matter the Secretary-General had allowed this method of operation to proceed although he had always regarded it as a temporary arrangement. He implied that General Von Horn had been in too poor health or lacking in sufficient vigour to undertake this function. However we went on to say that with a new and vigorous commander-in-chief he thought this situation would change.

2. Returning to the question of the chain of command Mr. Hammarskjöld said that he agreed that military advice to the Secretary-General's representative in the Congo should come from the commander-in-chief and that the proper place for General Rikhye was in New York. He hoped in due course to bring about this change subject of course to consultations with the commander-in-chief. He went on to say that the need which he had described for a senior military officer who could conduct mixed political and military negotiations would remain. Such a senior officer might be found on the staff of the commander-in-chief and therefore subject to his authority and could be despatched for example to the provinces when an emergency arose. Mr. Hammarskjöld added that General Von Horn had attempted to use

Colonel Berthiaume in this way on one or two occasions but that Berthiaume had not repeat not shown the qualities needed for political appreciation.

3. I then raised with the Secretary-General in an indirect fashion the role of his representative in the Congo. Mr. Hammarskjöld's reaction was immediate and categorical. He expressed complete confidence in Dayal (indeed throughout my talk with him it was clear how much he depended upon Dayal's reports and agreed with his conclusions). He said he was aware that Dayal had been criticized in particular by the ambassadors of USA and UK in Leopoldville. On the other hand these two ambassadors had been far from friendly to the UN efforts in the Congo. For example after the episode at the Ghana Embassy they had both attended the state funeral of Colonel Kokolo organized by the Congolese authorities which had in fact been an anti-UN demonstration as he said that Colonel Kokolo had been responsible for the Congolese attack on UN forces guarding the Ghana Embassy. Neither ambassador had seen fit to express any sympathy for the UN soldiers who were victims of this attack.

4. The Secretary-General then turned to the broader aspects of policy involved in the attitude of the present British and American representatives in the Congo (which he contrasted with the realism of the French Ambassador Charpentier). He said that USA Ambassador, Timberlake, in particular was in close touch with the Belgians and that it was apparently his aim to build up a government openly and entirely committed to the West. This he said was a sort of "pocket" of the old Dulles policy and he added parenthetically that the same line was being followed by USA Ambassador in Laos. In the Secretary-General's view this was a wrong policy both for Laos and for the Congo. What was needed in both cases was a broadly based government with a neutralist foreign policy oriented towards the West. It was a great mistake to build up individuals such as Colonel Mobutu and to base one's policy on them. This was particularly true in the fluctuating political conditions in the Congo. The UN policy on the contrary had been while paying respect to the authority of President Kasavubu not repeat not to become involved with any individual Congolese politician or party. This meant that the UN was relatively unpopular with all parties. At the same time the UN remained uncommitted and this in the long run would prove an advantage although great patience was needed in dealing with the Africans.

5. Speaking of the immediate political situation in the Congo Mr. Hammarskjöld said that he could already discern some hopeful signs for a process of conciliation among the Congolese leaders. Political divisions in the Congo were not repeat not so hard and fast as they looked from a distance and there were many waverings among those formerly committed to the extreme Lumumba line. The danger of a really effective alternative régime in Stanleyville with the subsequent threat of civil war had receded at least for the time being and there were contacts between the two political forces represented by Leopoldville and Stanleyville. He did not repeat not even exclude the possibility of the eventual release of Lumumba and his participation in some form of roundtable discussions which would represent all shades of opinion in the Congo. However he pointed out that relations between Kasavubu and Tshombe had very much deteriorated of late. It was possible that this was one element in drawing together Congolese politicians who were opposed to the separatism of Katanga.

6. The Secretary-General said that meanwhile he did not repeat not exclude the possibility that by early in the new year President Kasavubu would have installed a central government perhaps under the Prime Ministership of Ileo. Naturally the commissioners now in power would be very reluctant to get out. While they had no repeat no authority from the Congolese people they were enjoying power. I asked the Secretary-General how much effective authority he thought President Kasavubu had over Colonel Mobutu and the commissioners. Mr. Hammarskjöld replied that he had very little power and that it was necessary to strengthen his hand and to encourage him to form a legal government. He said that on December 21 he had addressed a letter to President Kasavubu calling his attention to the fact that while the two resolutions introduced into the UNGA on the subject of the Congo had failed to pass both had certain elements in common. In particular he reminded President Kasavubu that the UK-USA resolution had referred to the need for the restoration of parliamentary government, the maintenance of human rights in the Congo and cooperation with the UN authorities there. He expressed the hope that President Kasavubu would do everything in his power to implement these principles.

7. The Secretary-General went on to inform President Kasavubu that Congolese cooperation with the UN has been unsatisfactory in various ways and that if full cooperation were not repeat not forthcoming a situation might arise in which it was impossible for the UN to operate in the Congo.

8. Mr. Hammarskjöld considered that there were signs of a more cooperative attitude towards the UN on the part of President Kasavubu. In particular he was pleased that President Kasavubu had accepted the presence in the Congo of those members of the Conciliation Commission who desired to proceed there (I am sending a separate message on the subject of the Conciliation Commission). He thought that the Conciliation Commission had a good chance of accomplishing useful work in the Congo. Mr. Hammarskjöld expressed satisfaction that his own visit to the Congo and the arrival of the Conciliation Commission coincided with the conference at Rabat which President Nasser and other leaders sympathetic to Lumumba would be attending. He thought that if progress could be made in conciliation within the Congo through the Conciliation Commission this might take the wind out of the sails of the Rabat conference. He added that he hoped that at the termination of his visit to the Congo President Kasavubu would consent to a joint declaration in both their names which would emphasize Congolese-UN cooperation and which he hoped might also strengthen President Kasavubu's position in dealing with Mobutu. Mr. Hammarskjöld said that he would be visiting Cairo and India in the course of his present trip as he considered it essential to discuss events in the Congo with the leaders of the UAR and India.

9. Throughout the Secretary-General's analysis of the political situation in the Congo it was clear that his objective was the establishment of a legal and broadly based Congolese government and that with this objective in view he was anxious not repeat not to be outflanked by the more extreme elements in the Afro-Asian group. It was also apparent that he did not repeat not accept the legality of the Mobutu régime but that he intended to work with President Kasavubu and hoped to ensure his cooperation.

10. As indicated in paragraph 7 of your reference telegram I raised with the Secretary-General the question of the threatened withdrawal of national contingents from the UN Force and of the status of such contingents as have been withdrawn. He replied that at the present time no repeat no national contingents apart from the Yugoslavs had in fact been withdrawn. He emphasized that all national contingents in the Congo were still under UN command. He said that he had made it very plain to those who contemplated withdrawing contingents that such contingents could not repeat not be allowed to remain in the Congo unless under UN command. He had pointed out that if such a situation should arise he would have to ask for a meeting of the Security Council as the presence of such foreign troops in the Congo would be contrary to Security Council resolutions. He said that he had gone further in speaking to Fawzi of UAR when the latter was in New York and had told him that if UAR forces were withdrawn from UN command but remained in the Congo he would regard this as "aggression" and would take it up at once in the Security Council. With regard to the prospects of the withdrawal of national contingents Mr. Hammarskjöld said that his main concern was with the probability that the Moroccan forces would be withdrawn which would greatly weaken the UN operation. As for the others he said that Ceylon had "changed its mind" about withdrawal of its force which would now remain. The Ethiopians showed no repeat no tendency to leave. The Burmese contingent might be withdrawn but this would be because of the external threat to Burma not repeat not because of the Congo situation. He also considered that the withdrawal of the Yugoslavs was part of a wider pattern of their relations with USSR and China. The Guinean forces might be withdrawn but if so it would be "good riddance" and meanwhile they were located in a "pocket" where they could do no repeat no harm. There was no repeat no sign of withdrawal of the Indonesian forces at the moment. In his opinion Ghana would be reluctant to withdraw its forces.

11. UAR force was a special case. He had no repeat no indication that UAR government intended their early withdrawal. He said that the UK and USA had called his attention to the nefarious activities of UAR forces in the Congo and attempt to stir up trouble in Stanleyville and elsewhere. He had therefore asked Dayal for a report on these activities and had received one dated December 28. This report referred to several very suspicious incidents in which the UAR forces might be involved but had pointed out that the UN had not repeat not the sort of intelligence facilities which would have been necessary to check up fully on UAR activities. Dayal had added that the suspected activities of UAR troops needed careful watching but that he had not repeat not been able to produce hard evidence. Mr. Hammarskjöld seemed a little inclined to discount the seriousness of such activities and added that in any event it was worthwhile to take some risk to keep the UAR contingent there especially as he considered that their withdrawal would be immediately followed by the withdrawal of the much more numerous Moroccan forces.

12. Speaking of his own role in the Congo and the pressures he had been under in the UN the Secretary-General said that difficult as this period had been it had not repeat not affected his own feeling of inner independence. He was not repeat not dependent on any bloc or individual and he did not repeat not care for his job in itself except as an opportunity for service.

13. In contrast to the signs of tension and fatigue which the Secretary-General showed at the end of the UNGA he seemed in a relaxed and almost buoyant mood. I do not repeat not know how much he was whistling to keep his courage up.

14. I apologize for the inordinate length of this message but I thought that the Secretary-General's full and frank account of his views merited an extended report. I am dealing in a separate message with a subsequent conversation I had with him on the subject of Laos.

LAW OF THE SEA
CONSEQUENCES OF FAILURE OF THE CONFERENCE

In view of the fact that it appears from recent discussions with Western European countries that some of these states or government departments concerned appear to be considering the failure of the Conference as a preferable alternative to the adoption of the Canadian proposal, we are outlining in this telegram for use in any further discussions you might have, some of the possible implications of the failure of the Conference. The argument of paragraph (a) is, of course, applicable only with respect to NATO countries:

(a) Defence Implications. It appears to Canada that the Canadian proposal is the only formula which can obtain two-thirds majority support for a 6-mile territorial sea. If distant water fishing states are unwilling to fall back on the Canadian proposal at the Conference because of a decision to place fishing interests above security interests, the result, in our view, can only be the failure of the Conference. The breakdown of the Conference without agreement would inevitably lead to a wide number of unilateral claims to territorial sea limits of 12 miles or even more. A general 12-mile territorial sea may be expected in areas of critical importance for the defence of the free world in Africa, Asia, South and Central America, with grave implications for western defence policy.

(b) General Effect on Fishing Interests. By preferring the failure of the Conference to the adoption of the Canadian formula, fishing interests of distant water fishing states will not benefit. Unilateral claims will be likely to lead to the loss not only of 12-mile coastal zones but even greater areas. In the absence of firm internationally approved territorial sea and fishery limits many states may consider that, because of the "legal vacuum" larger areas of high seas (i.e. beyond 12-miles) can be appropriately used by the coastal states. The international community have already seen examples of this: Ecuador, Peru, Chile, El Salvador and others in South America; Korea, Indonesia and The Philippines in Asia.

(c) Chain Reaction in Western Europe. So far as distant water fishing in the Western European and North Atlantic areas is concerned the failure of the Conference may have graver implications for distant water fishing states than the Canadian proposal. In the absence of a firm 12-mile fishery limit the possibility cannot be excluded of Iceland assuming jurisdiction over Icelandic continental shelf bringing in its train even greater displacement of foreign fishing than has already occurred through the adoption of a 12-mile zone by Iceland in 1958.

(As far back as 1948 Icelandic Parliament authorized government to establish jurisdiction over entire continental shelf.) Norway has intimated it will have to take unilateral action if no agreement is reached on an exclusive 12-mile fishery limit. Western European states (with the exception of the U.K.) are already excluded from fishing in the 12-mile limit around Faeroes Islands and Denmark has recently indicated possible necessity of similar limits for Greenland, which will have effect on German and other distant water fishing. In the North Sea [sic] the Soviet Union already possesses and enforces a 12-mile territorial sea limit.

The displacement of Western European trawlers might accordingly lead to increased fishing off countries such as Ireland and the U.K. which, as the Dutch and Belgium authorities have already noted, could well result in U.K., Ireland and other similarly placed countries also excluding foreign fishing trawlers. Thus while Belgian and Dutch authorities seem to fear that the Canadian proposal would lead to the loss of distant water fishing grounds for herring off Ireland and the U.K. this same result might inevitably flow from the failure of the Conference. As French trawler operations have been or are largely off Iceland, Norway and Ireland, chain reaction following from the failure of the Conference will have similar implications for them. If the Conference fails there would, however, be added disadvantage for distant water fishing states of possibility of friction and the substantial risk of claims being made to limits greater than 12 miles.

(d) Non-Recognition of Claims not an Effective Policy. Non-recognition of unilateral claims would neither seem an effective nor feasible policy in the event of the failure of the Conference. Non-recognition will not, of course, in itself prevent enforcement of unilateral claims by coastal states. Attempts by distant water fishing states to protect by force fishing by its nationals in waters claimed by a coastal state would seem both unrealistic and unprofitable from a fisheries point of view and politically unfeasible. Nor is it likely that such a policy would be strengthened by resort to the International Court of Justice for the following reasons:

(1) A court judgment can only be obtained if two countries agree to its jurisdiction; accordingly it may not be possible to bring before the court a state claiming a 12-mile limit.

(2) Assuming the court has jurisdiction there can nevertheless be no assurance that it will uphold the case of distant water fishing states. In the event of the failure of the Conference, it would seem unlikely that the International Court could hold that the 3-mile limit was the only existing rule of law and that all claims in excess of 3 miles were ipso facto invalid. According to our count eight of the fifteen countries whose nationals serve in the court favour either a 12-mile territorial sea limit or an exclusive 12-mile fishing zone. These are: Norway, Poland, UAR, Uruguay, USSR, Argentina, Mexico and Panama.

(3) If an adverse judgment is handed down, the consequence might well lead to a universal 12-mile territorial sea limit. The result would not only be a loss of fishing grounds but would have the gravest results for western security.

Summary

This analysis demonstrates that the failure of the Conference would be likely to lead to a rapid disintegration of traditional fishing arrangements and patterns in the North Atlantic and Western European areas — a disintegration which began with the failure of the First Conference on the Law of the Sea[34] and which could only be accelerated by the failure of the Second Conference. The Canadian proposal which in our view is the only formula which can succeed at the next conference, not only will provide for a clear, universal and orderly system of law, which both protects western security interests and sets a firm limit on the extent of fishing zones, but will enable states, through mutual negotiation to enter into bilateral transitional accommodations and agreements for the phasing out or continuation by treaty of distant water fishing operations now being carried on.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 68-60 [Ottawa], February 29, 1960
SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SECOND UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON THE LAW OF THE SEA

I. INTRODUCTION

The Second United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea will be convened in Geneva from March 17 to April 15, 1960. The Conference will devote itself exclusively to the two subjects which were left unsettled by the First Conference on the Law of the Sea — the questions of the breadth of the territorial sea and of fishing limits.[35]

2. Cabinet has agreed that the Honourable George Drew should lead the Canadian Delegation, and should be assisted by 13 Delegates, Advisers and Liaison Officers.

3. The prospects of the Canadian proposal (a 6-mile territorial sea and a further 6-mile exclusive fishing zone) have been improving; however, the proposal for a discretionary 3-to-12 mile territorial sea has also strengthened since the last Conference. At the present time, there are about 27 states which claim territorial sea limits in excess of 6 miles; this group will come close to wielding a veto power at the Conference over proposals calling for a 6-mile territorial sea. In addition, a number of Western European countries, the United Kingdom and the United States may oppose the Canadian proposal on the grounds that it does not recognize "traditional fishing rights;" some Western European states might well prefer the failure of the Conference to its adoption. If the voting strength of the extremist states claiming a 12-mile territorial sea is increased by the addition of the negative votes of these Western European states, the Canadian formula will not be able to obtain the two-thirds majority support necessary for its adoption. Nevertheless, it seems likely that if agreement is to be reached at the Conference, it will have to be upon some compromise formula such as the Canadian proposal which stands more or less as a half-way house between the positions of the Soviet Union and a number of Latin American, African and Asian states on the one hand, and the position of the Western Powers on the other, each of which groups is capable of vetoing the solution of the other. On balance, however, the prospects of the Conference cannot be considered good.

II. RECOMMENDATIONS

4. I recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of Fisheries and of Northern Affairs and National Resources, that:

(a) The Canadian Delegation be authorized to put forward at the Conference a proposal for a 6-mile territorial sea and for a further exclusive 6-mile fishing zone (the Canadian proposal);

[35] Voir/See Volume 24, document 80.

(b) The Delegation use its discretion to determine the most appropriate time, during the proceedings of the Conference, for putting forward the Canadian proposal, and in determining which countries should be asked to act as co-sponsors;

(c) If necessary, in order to facilitate Western European, United Kingdom and United States support for the Canadian formula, the Canadian Delegation be authorized, during debates at the Conference and in private discussions, to make known that Canada is willing to negotiate bilaterally or multilaterally with countries which now fish within the 6-to-12 mile zone off Canada's coasts, making clear, however, that the purpose of such negotiations would be to reach agreements on a phasing-out period of a maximum of ten years, which agreements would come into effect on the condition that the Canadian formula is adopted by the Second Conference and ratified by the states in question.

(d)(i) In the event that Portugal and Spain are interested in negotiating a bilateral phasing-out period, the Canadian Delegation be authorized to negotiate at the Conference itself such agreements for a maximum period of ten years; or, if this is not possible, to agree on behalf of Canada, in principle, to the negotiation of such agreements after the Conference (on the assumption that the Canadian proposal is approved by the Conference).

(ii) In the event that the United States and France evince interest in negotiating a bilateral phasing-out period of a maximum of ten years, the Canadian Delegation may commence negotiations on this basis, but should refer to the Government for instructions as to the substance of the agreements concerned in other respects before carrying the negotiations beyond the initial stages.

(e) In the event that the above-mentioned countries are unwilling to support the Canadian proposal on the grounds that a ten-year phasing-out period is inadequate from their point of view, and should it appear that the Canadian proposal cannot succeed without their support, Cabinet should be informed.

(f) If, during the deliberations of the Conference, it should appear that the Canadian proposal would have a better chance of obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority support if amended so as to recognize a phasing-out period of a maximum of ten years, the Canadian Delegation is not authorized to introduce, nor to support such an amendment to its own proposal without prior reference to the Government, which will take a decision in this respect in the light of the United States attitude towards the bilateral settlement of outstanding territorial waters issues between the two countries.

(g) In the light of developments at the Conference, the Canadian Delegation is authorized to put forward, or actively seek the success of the fall-back position approved by the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters at its meeting on October 13, 1959, for an exclusive 12-mile fisheries jurisdiction, with no provision being made for the territorial sea. It is understood that the Canadian Delegation should endeavour to have both branches of the Canadian proposal voted upon as a unit, but if it appears that a divided vote would be to Canada's advantage, the Canadian Delegation might, at its discretion, support or call for a division in voting at any stage of the Conference proceedings, and might, in general, take whatever procedural steps with regard to voting on the Canadian proposal which seem to be to Canada's best advantage.

(h) If the 12-mile fishing zone is approved separately, with no provision on the breadth of the territorial sea, or in the event that neither the 12-mile fishing zone nor the 6-mile territorial sea is approved, and should there be a revival of the tripartite proposal which was put forward by Canada, India and Mexico at the First Conference (which, in addition to a 6-mile territorial sea and a further 6-mile exclusive fishing zone, would have recognized existing territorial sea limits between 6 and 12 miles, provided that these were declared prior to the beginning of the Conference), the Canadian Delegation should seek new instructions from the Government.

5. The Canadian Delegation should make every effort to keep Ottawa completely informed of all significant developments, so that decisions can be taken by the Canadian Government in the light of developments as they occur, bearing in mind that the primary objective of the Declaration is to achieve majority support for the Canadian proposal or, failing this, for a 12-mile exclusive fishing zone.[36]

LAW OF THE SEA — ASSESSMENT OF DEVELOPMENTS

It has not repeat not been possible to send to you an earlier general summary and assessment of developments at the Conference. As you know, the first few days were devoted to procedural and organizational matters (see my telegram 287 March 18).† It was only during the past week that discussions in the Committee of the Whole began to gather momentum. My telegrams 303 March 22,† 302 March 22,† 311 March 24,† and [number missing] March 28, give a brief summary of the positions of the thirteen countries which have spoken to date and of the schedule of work which is planned in the Committee of the Whole.

2. Significant developments at the Conference can, I think, be summarized as follows:

(a) The Mexican Procedural Amendments (see my telegram 287 March 18 for a description of these and their possible effect). The tactical reasons for Mexico's reintroducing the two-thirds majority rule for consideration of proposals are somewhat uncertain but it is possible that the amendment was designed to make changes of position more difficult in the Committee by impeding the switching of votes to a compromise positions (i.e. away from the 12-mile Territorial sea position).

(b) The differences between the new Soviet proposal and the formula which it submitted at the First Conference are discussed in my telegram [302] March 22. The new Mexican proposal is set out in my telegram [302] March 22. Opinion at the Conference is divided as to whether the introduction by the Soviet Union of the discretionary 3-to-12 mile territorial sea proposal (the proposal put forward by Mexico and 7 other powers at the last Conference) and the submission of a new formula by Mexico represents an agreed strategical manoeuvre worked out in advance by the main countries favouring a 12-mile territorial sea limit, or whether, as is perhaps somewhat more likely, the Mexicans decided to push for a more extreme position in Committee for tactical reasons, reserving the 3-to-12 mile formula as a compromise for plenary, the Soviet Union then putting forward the 3-to-12 mile formula in Committee on their own initiative. Whatever the explanation, the result would appear to be a possible weakening in the prospects of the proposal for 3-to-12 mile territorial sea. The fact that this has now become the official Soviet position rather than one put forward by some Latin American, African or Asian states might well have an effect on the attitude of many of the uncommitted nations.

(c) USA Formula. As you will note from the text of this formula telegram 311 March 24 the concept of traditional fishing rights, while limited in some respects by Article 3 of the proposal, is stated in such broad terms (for example the original USA formula was more restricted in application with regard to the area in which the rights can be exercised) that it seems clear that the proposal has been put forward with little hope of success, and rather as a point of departure, so to speak, for a future compromise. USA Delegation has in fact made it clear to us on a number of occasions that the proposal is being put forward more or less as a concession to certain distant water fishing states and to their own fishing industry. I am convinced that the broad terms in which this concept is put forward reflects the influence of their fishing lobby.

(d) The French Position. The French Delegation has indicated a willingness to enter into a bilateral agreement with Canada for phasing-out. While the precise length of time they would agree upon is not repeat not certain, we have the impression that they would accept a 10 to 12-year phasing-out period (to come into force on the adoption of the Canadian proposal) provided that Norway and Denmark, in addition to Canada, would grant France a similar period. Professor Gros intimated that on these conditions France would both support the Canadian formula and agree to the extinction of its treaty rights. The discussion was, however, purely informal and exploratory.

(e) The Norwegian Position. It appears that Norway is reluctant to entertain the notion of bilateral agreements. If there is to be phasing-out, they seem to prefer it within the rule of law itself. It is possible that the Norwegian Government is concerned about complications with regard to EFTA negotiations. If there are to be any bilateral fishing concessions, they may consider it to their advantage for such concessions to be made in the context of EFTA and in exchange for concessions in that field by the UK or other countries. In any event, the Norwegians are not repeat not prepared to entertain the notion of a tapering-off period as part of the rule of law unless clear evidence can be adduced that such a concession is essential to ensure majority for the Canadian proposal. Norway has also enquired about the possibility of being able to claim a phasing-out period for fishing in the 3-to-12 mile zone off the Canadian Atlantic coast (assuming Norway could claim traditional fishing rights under the USA formula). While to date these discussions with Norway have been most informal, it would seem that their negative attitude towards the bilateral approach could place obstacles in the way of its success.

(f) New Support for the Canadian Proposal. Several new countries have indicated support for our formula: e.g. South Africa, Liberia, Brazil, Haiti, Colombia and possibly Chile and Argentina.

3. In general, the debates so far have been moderate in tone and, on the whole, encouraging. However, the Conference is still in its preliminary stages with many states remaining rather reluctant to indicate either in the debates or informally what solutions they are ultimately prepared to accept. The opinion of many of the delegations with which we have had discussions (for example Portugal, Italy, New Zealand, Australia) is that, under present alignments, no repeat no proposal can come close to obtaining two-thirds majority support and that only agreement between Canada and the USA may break the impasse and perhaps pave the way to a Conference agreement.

4. Canadian tactics have been to remain firmly in favour of the unqualified 6 plus 6 and to emphasize the desirability of bilateral or multilateral agreements. To date, there has, however, been no USA reaction to a number of informal suggestions that there might be advantages in Canada-US Delegations consultations. We have the impression that because of the fishing lobby influences within his Delegation, Mr. Dean is unable either to initiate or to agree to such discussions until the defeat of the USA proposal in Committee.

5. This has not repeat not limited my personal contacts with Dean and I have seen him privately twice to explore the prospects and timing Canada-USA understanding which we both regard as essential to the success of the Conference.

6. As you know, we delayed until the first week of the debate the submission of the Canadian proposal and the making of the main Canadian statement. After due consideration it was our opinion that because of the compromise nature of the Canadian proposal, it would be better to let the Soviet Union and the US table their own proposals and make their own statements before coming forward ourselves. This has enabled us to give full emphasis to the compromise nature of the Canadian proposal. We refrained from waiting any longer before submitting our proposal in view of the fact that this might have given rise to speculation among some states as to whether the Canadian position was not firm. This would have made it more difficult for certain states to make clear statements in support of the Canadian proposal.

7. I might add that our relations with the UK Delegation have been close and extremely cordial. The Head of the Delegation, the Right Honourable John Hare has been of assistance to us with regard to the timing of our proposal and statement. I know that he suggested to Mr. Dean that it would be desirable for Dean to table the US proposal and make the US statement before the Canadian statement was made.

8. If this is satisfactory we propose to continue to send you reports of trends and developments on the Conference at the end of each week.

LAW OF THE SEA

In the attached telegram,†[37] Mr. Drew reports that the United States and the United Kingdom have agreed to support the Canadian formula with the addition of a ten-year phasing-out period of traditional fishing practices in the outer six mile fishing zone. It is proposed that Mr. Drew and Mr. Dean withdraw the present Canadian and United States proposals in committee tomorrow and table in their place a joint Canadian-United States formula incorporating a ten-year phasing-out period. It is expected that, in addition to the United Kingdom, most of the Western European and other countries which have been insisting on the preservation of historic fishing rights, will now support this compromise.

Among the reasons cited by Mr. Drew for submitting a proposal along these lines at this early stage in the Conference proceedings are:

Seadel to Ottawa telegram 413, April 6.

(a) According to the Delegation's present assessment, the prospects are that neither the Canadian unqualified "six-plus-six" nor the United States "historic rights" formula would receive a majority vote in committee. On the other hand, it is almost a certainty that the Soviet 12-mile proposal would gain a majority vote. It is Mr. Drew's view that if the Soviet 12-mile formula were to emerge as the only proposal accepted in Committee, the prospects for any Western six-mile proposal in plenary session would be shattered.

(b) A number of the states in favour of a six-mile territorial sea have been indicating a growing impatience with both the United States and Canada for their apparent inability to reach a reasonable compromise which they could all support.

(c) A number of these states, including Ghana and Pakistan, have been suggesting various compromises and have been threatening to introduce such proposals themselves in the absence of a United States-Canadian agreement.

An even more important consideration in assessing these developments is the fact that, for the first time since the commencement of the First Conference on the Law of the Sea in 1958, the United States and the United Kingdom will be united with Canada in support of a common position. The prospects for the success of the Conference will be greatly enhanced by this solid alignment. At the same time, as Mr. Drew has pointed out, even if the Conference fails to accept this proposal, Canada will have gained substantially by having achieved a common position with the United States which preserves the basic elements of the original Canadian formula. (As you are aware, the incorporation of a phasing-out period of up to ten years in the Canadian proposal has, in any case, been regarded as a fall-back position to which the Canadian Delegation could ultimately agree.)

Unfortunately, a report of this compromise arrangement has already been leaked to the press in Geneva and its details are now known to the public. In the circumstances, I propose, if you agree, to advise Mr. Drew of our pleasure at this development and of our agreement with the course he has proposed.[38]

STATEMENT EXPLAINING THE CANADA-U.S. PROPOSAL

There are a couple of points which I suggest you might make in addition to those outlined in the draft statement I gave you the other day.[39]

2. It may be important to dispel any impression that this joint move is inspired by cold war considerations. Neutrals may be tempted to avoid taking sides if the struggle appears to resolve itself into a Soviet bloc vs. a Western attempt to achieve a propaganda victory. Perhaps this reaction may be anticipated and prevented if you were to take the line that both we and the U.S. came to the Conference with different positions in traditional fishing rights. The two positions have now become reconciled in the light of the general impression which emerged from the debate that such an arrangement would be more equitable and more likely to assist the Conference in reaching a positive decision. The tabling of the joint proposal may thus be presented as a response to a broad desire on the part of many delegations to find a satisfactory solution rather than as a previously conceived Western operation executed in carefully prepared stages.

[38] Télégramme à Drew non retrouvé./Telegram to Drew not located.
[39] Non retrouvé./Not located.

3. In introducing the joint proposal, you may also wish to stress that it is an attempt to provide an answer to the two basic issues facing the Conference. You may wish to urge delegations to facilitate a decision by not attempting to broaden the debate and to introduce other issues. Such issues may be important and urgent but they are not covered by our terms of reference and they may, in the end, divide us and result in the failure of the Conference.

4. I am afraid that as attitudes tend to become polarized around two basic schemes and the choice facing the Conference becomes clearer, a number of countries will now try to bring out favourite projects and to tack them to the particular kite which their side is flying. It will not be possible, I know, to say this openly, but an appeal to stick to the main issues, to concentrate all efforts in resolving the main business if success is to be achieved, may have a salutary effect.

5. If you ask what I have in mind specifically, I can mention, for instance, the Cuban and Vietnamese itch to discuss the preferential rights of coastal states as to fisheries over the continental shelf or the desire of a number of states to have the general rules to be adopted amended in such a way as to deal with particular situations. Such attempts to deal with individual cases defeat the purpose of legislature. The Norwegians for instance wish to ensure that trawlers may be excluded from certain areas, attempts to cover "historic waters" may render meaningless the rules to be adopted.

6. The point to be made essentially, is that the Conference can just do so much in its task of legislation and that attempts to broaden the scope of its work may compromise the chances of success. This should be coupled of course with an expression of willingness to be flexible; to avoid hardship and, whenever possible to develop a general rule which reflects the common interest to the maximum extent possible.

7. Perhaps this point could best be presented as the first one; the simplicity of the joint proposal is in response to the keen and widespread desire of delegations to reach a generally acceptable solution, in the full appreciation of the fact that the proposal does not solve all particular problems and that some general problems may be left for later consideration or for agreements outside the rule of law.

LAW OF THE SEA

Attached are:

(a) the original Canadian proposal as tabled by Mr. Drew on March 24,†

(b) the text of the joint Canadian-U.S. proposal presented by Mr. Drew and the United States representative, Mr. Dean, on April 8.† The essential difference between these two proposals is the inclusion in the joint U.S.-Canadian draft of a clause providing for the establishment of a ten-year period during which states which have made a practice of fishing in the outer six-mile zone of other states may continue to do so for a period of ten years from October 31, 1960. This clause is a compromise between the straight six and six formula of Canada and the original United States proposal for a recognition of these historic "rights" in perpetuity.

Why did this compromise become necessary? The Canadian Delegation and others in Geneva have been conscious of the vital importance of the Conference reaching a reasonable solution of the problem of the breadth of the territorial sea and of fishing zones. It has become increasingly apparent from statements made by delegates from countries holding moderate views that an agreed Canadian-United States position represented the best hope for a generally accepted solution. Unless support for the separate Canadian and United States proposals could be consolidated, there was a serious danger that an extreme proposal might be adopted. As a result, the United States agreed with Canada to drop from their proposal the claim for historic fishing "rights" in perpetuity, while Canada for its part has agreed to have included in the rule of law a ten-year phasing out period for these historic "rights." Consequently the joint proposal represents a genuine compromise between the two proposals neither of which, it appeared at the Conference, might have been able to command the required support.

The hope is that with the achievement of this compromise between Canada and the United States a sufficient number of countries will rally to the support of the new joint proposal to ensure the necessary two-thirds majority, thus enabling the Conference to reach a successful conclusion.

The vote in committee will take place on Wednesday April 13. Present prospects are unpredictable but every effort is being made both at the Conference and through diplomatic channels to promote the acceptance of the new formula.[40]

WEEKLY SUMMARY: LAW OF SEA

The following are further comments on the voting in yesterday's debate and on the prospects for success in plenary session.

2. There seems no repeat no question that the addition of a 10-year phasing-out period to the Canadian proposal has proved effective and successful. The phasing-out period has brought about the support of virtually the entire Western European group for our 6 plus 6 formula as well as a number of other Asian and Latin American states which were in favour of a period of adjustment prior to the general adoption of a 12 mile fishing zone. Furthermore our impression is that, with the exception of Iceland which we still hope will be in a position to support the [40] Le 13 avril, la proposition conjointe Canada-États-Unis a été adoptée par 43 votes favorables contre 33, avec 12 abstentions.

On April 13, the joint Canada-US proposal was adopted by 43 votes in favour, 33 against, with 12 abstentions.

Canadian resolution in plenary session, the addition of the phasing-out period to the Canadian proposal did not repeat not lose a single vote for the 6-mile territorial sea. The votes of Argentina as well as Chile, Equador, Peru and El Salvador were not repeat not forthcoming for our proposal because of their concern about preferential fishing rights beyond the 12 mile fishing zone. With regard to Burma it is clear that their vote in favour of the 12 mile territorial sea and against the Canada-USA formula was on grounds of solidarity with the Afro-Asian group. Yugoslavia also voted against our proposal but the phasing-out period probably made no repeat no or little difference to their attitude which was generally uncooperative and pro-Soviet.

3. As you know the prospects for the success of the Committee resolution in plenary session seem reasonably good but success cannot by any means be regarded as assured. Two possible dangers which we may have to face in plenary session concern:

(a) A proposal along lines put forward by Argentina relating the qualifying period for claiming historic rights to the motion of prescription and thus extending the period to some length such as 30 years. (The success of such an amendment would clearly upset the terms of our compromise and the prospects of the proposal.)

(b) A divided vote on the various paragraphs of the proposal. There are of course other possibilities which may emerge in plenary session such as an attempt to adjourn the debate; it will have to be expected that certain countries such as Mexico will be manoeuvring behind the scenes for the failure of the Conference.

4. General tactics of the Soviet, Arab and Mexican Delegations emerged towards the end of the debate in Committee Session. It may be expected that they will continue to emphasize these arguments to an even greater degree in the course of the next week. The main arguments they put forward to weaken our proposal are:

(a) Canada-USA formula is not repeat not a compromise; it is a mere arrangement between countries favouring two aspects of what is essentially the same position; there has been no repeat no compromise on the territorial sea because the 3 mile limit does not repeat not exist any longer and the 6 mile limit is the starting point of the Western Maritime group. Any compromise on territorial sea, it is argued, would have to take the USA and UK beyond 6 miles.

(b) A two-thirds majority would be a mere "automatic" or "paper majority" in that one-third of the states of the world would not repeat not abide by it — for example the Russians — and therefore the 6 mile limit would never become genuine international law. In fact those favouring a 12 mile limit could set up a competing convention recognizing the 12 mile limit.

(c) Security Argument. It is argued that 12 mile limit is essential for the security of small states — it will prevent western warships from coming close to their coast, performing exercises, etc. The arguments on the security side have been continually put forward but on the whole in reasonably restrained terms and (with the exception of Saudi Arabia whose last intervention was slightly more moderate) consistent with the desire not repeat not to introduce too much venom in the debate at this point.

(d) The failure of the Conference is better for the small states than its success. Mexico has argued continuously that if the Conference fails the 12 mile limit will be eventually sanctioned through usage.

8. In order to see the success of the Conference we have as you know suggested that efforts will be required on four fronts with respect to (1) the Icelandic problem (we consider that the Icelandic vote will be essential to the success of the joint proposal; (2) the question of passage of warships in the outer 6 mile zone (we have yet to learn whether India will accept the US-

UK proposal. Mr. Sen said yesterday that Cabinet may have to decide. In the meantime Pakistan seems to be concerned about Indian requests and may raise objections). (3) the question of preferential rights in the high seas adjacent to the exclusive fishing zone (we are discussing this matter with USA Delegation today) and (4) the question of technical assistance to newer tasks regarding the development of a modern fishing industry.

9. You will have received telegrams on all of these four points.

LAW OF THE SEA — PASSAGE OF WARSHIPS

Our Delegation in Geneva has learned that the Indian Delegation has been instructed by Delhi not to accept the US-UK compromise offer on the notification by warships in the outer six-mile zone. The Indian vote is of course critical to the success of the joint Canada-US proposal and we understand that Mr. Nehru has himself been involved in this decision. We should like you therefore as a matter of urgency to press the Indians to reconsider this decision. You should if possible see the Prime Minister himself and leave aide-mémoire.

2. We are deeply concerned about the possible failure of the Second UN Conference on the Law of the Sea which is now entering its final phase at Geneva. The success of this Conference must rest on the acceptance of the joint Canada-US proposal — the only one to receive a majority vote in Committee. The failure of the Conference to settle the breadth of the territorial sea and the extent of the contiguous zone will endanger the immense achievement of the First Conference and the inability to agree on these two critical issues could furthermore lead to chaotic conditions which in themselves could pose a threat to the peace of the world.

3. It is therefore hoped that Mr. Nehru may find it possible to reconsider the decision which we understand has been taken against committing Indian support for the joint Canada-US proposal as supplemented by the latest US and UK formulas for the passage of warships through the outer six-mile contiguous zone. We feel sure that the Indians share our belief that the best interests of all nations would be served by the success of the Conference and that its failure would have most unfortunate results. While they are undoubtedly moved by considerations of national security we wonder nevertheless whether it would be possible for them to weigh once again the advantages which would accrue to India through the complete codification of the law of the sea against the particular concession involved in accepting notification in lieu of authorization on the issue of passage of warships.

4. The major Maritime powers of the West have in a spirit of compromise moved to the position represented by the joint Canada-US proposal after having made many major concessions. Their offer to agree to notification in the outer six-mile zone without prejudice to the conflicting views of states on the procedure which should apply in the territorial sea is a further example of their willingness to compromise in the interests of a successful outcome to the Conference.[41]

5. For the first time in history the world community, through give-and-take across the Conference table, is on the threshold of achieving a codified law of the sea. With India support we believe that the joint Canada-US proposal would prove acceptable to the great majority of the nations assembled in Geneva. Otherwise we fear that at this stage no other proposal can gain acceptance. We hope therefore that the Indians will find it possible to instruct their delegation to explore with the major Western Maritime nations the kind of arrangements they would be prepared to make to meet the Indian situation so that their delegation could be authorized to support the Canadian-USA proposal.

LAW OF THE SEA — PASSAGE OF WAR SHIPS

India is now one of the most important factors in obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority. We have sent extensive telegrams to Ottawa on this subject which can be digested for your information, but briefly this is the situation.

2. The Indian Government is pressing for a resolution which will declare that war ships must secure prior consent for innocent passage in the outer six mile zone which we have described as the fishing zone. In today's telegrams numbers 217† and 218† Ronning has given an excellent report of the situation at Delhi.

3. It is clear that India has no repeat no other interest in the question of notification, consent or other restrictions on the operation of war ships than their preoccupation with Pakistan's movement of ships between the separated parts of their country. Khrishna Menon has his Deputy Minister of Defense watching Sen at Geneva, and I must say that he is as sinister a character as I have seen in many a day. I mention this to explain why India insists upon "prior consent" for innocent passage of warships. This has no repeat no other purpose as far as they are concerned than an attempt to restrict the movement of vessels between East and West Pakistan.

4. Now that Ghana has declared that they will support our proposal, India would be the only member of the Commonwealth adopting a contrary position and aligning themselves with the USSR in a demand for a twelve mile territorial sea.

The sentence "In this same spirit arrangements might be elaborated which would come closer to meeting the Indian Government's concern," was crossed out by Green.

5. I know that you are aware of Nehru's high regard for you personally and also the feeling amongst the responsible members of the Indian Government that Canada has no repeat no hidden motives.

6. Under these circumstances may I suggest that you give consideration to the desirability of an urgent message to Nehru or perhaps a phone call, in which you would express the hope that with the Prime Ministers' Conference only two weeks away, India will not repeat not stand alone in opposing a position which has now been accepted by every other member of the Commonwealth. It might be appropriate to point out that in so many fields we have found common ground and that having regard to our close personal relationship, you would hope that we might join forces in the support of the only proposal which now offers any hope of world wide agreement as an alternative to chaos.

7. As the voting will take place later this week, may I suggest that if you concur with this suggestion, the message to Nehru be transmitted as soon as possible.

8. What may seem obvious but perhaps requires emphasis is that having regard to the vote in committee the issue is no repeat no longer between two conflicting points of view but is now simply between the acceptance of the six plus six formula by 2/3 majority or failure of the Conference which will be as disastrous for India as for any other country in the world.

9. I need not repeat not emphasize that a satisfactory outcome of this Conference is of immense importance to Canada, implementing as it would the advantages already gained at the earlier Conference in the measurement of base lines and the right over the continental shelf. The support of India will have a profound effect on the Afro/Asian countries now uncertain about the course they will follow. The success or failure of this Conference may well depend on Nehru's personal decision.[42]

LAW OF [THE] SEA — INDIA'S POSITION

1. I have just learned from Sen, Leader of the Indian Delegation, that he will now vote against the joint Canada-USA proposal. He showed me a telegram he had just received from New Delhi saying that as there was no repeat no provision for the control of warships in the outer six miles to which they attached such importance there was no repeat no choice but to vote against the Canada-USA proposal. I am confident this is Krishna Menon's work because they gain nothing and lose a great deal by the failure of the Conference.

2. This comes to us as a very disappointing blow particularly as we had been led to believe that India would abstain. India's position is likely to influence a number of votes and may wreck the Conference.

3. UK Delegation have reported this development to London and suggested urgent appeal to Mr. Nehru from Macmillan.

4. In the circumstances I suggest that you consider speaking to Nehru personally, pointing out that India's attitude may mean the failure of an important UK, Canada, USA undertaking which was on the point of providing a solution satisfactory for a large number of countries on many, if not repeat not all, problems relating to the law of [the] sea. The only alternative is no repeat no law at all.

5. Before we learned this news, there was good reason to believe that the joint proposal was likely to receive just enough votes to obtain the required two-thirds support on the assumption that India would abstain.

6. This is in fact almost a deliberate act of sabotage, because USA and UK have indicated their willingness [le document est déchiré/original torn] to notification where ships enter outer six miles. [Le document est déchiré/original torn] as India is concerned for supporting our proposal or at least abstaining is that on a basis of international law established here a solution of this problem by the UN presents no repeat no serious difficulty in view of the position taken by USA and UK. That in fact is the only place that this problem can be dealt with effectively.[43]

CONFERENCE ON LAW OF [THE] SEA — FINAL VOTING IN PLENARY

Our assessment leading up to the hour of the voting indicated an extremely small margin of votes above a bare two-thirds majority for the Canada-USA proposal. It was apparent that 2 or 3 or perhaps even one vote, would be decisive. However, even with the disappointing attitude of India there were grounds for optimism.

2. The joint proposal failed to be adopted by the closest possible margin. If any one country voting in the negative had abstained, the proposal would have been adopted. Similarly, if any two countries abstaining had voted in favour the Conference would have succeeded. There was good reason to think that Chile and Ecuador had found accommodation in the three-power amendment providing for preferential rights which they had actively promoted and voted for in plenary. However both states voted against.

3. While the negative vote of India and Burma was expected, the negative votes of Chile and Ecuador were not repeat not. Moreover, it was expected that Japan and the Philippines would vote in favour of the proposal: however, they abstained. On the motion for reconsideration, Chile and Japan both voted in favour; on the other hand Ghana voted for the joint proposal, but against reconsideration.

4. What was particularly unfortunate was that as part of the agreement whereby the proposal on special situations was put forward, Chile agreed to support the Canadian-USA proposal and Ecuador agreed to abstain. Their negative votes were thus completely unexpected. The failure of the Canadian-USA proposal was thus due in part to the failure of these countries to keep their part of the bargain. It also failed partly because of the attitude of India which appeared fully prepared to do [its] share to wreck the possibility of a Conference agreement.

5. There was reason for gratification, however, about the positive votes of a number of states, such as Argentina, Finland, Tunisia, Jordan, Ghana and Ethiopia and about the abstentions of Lebanon and Iran.

6. There was a rapid erosion of support for the Canada-USA proposal when the decision came to be taken for reconsideration. Four states, Cuba, Finland, Paraguay and Tunisia, changed their votes from in favour to abstention, and Ghana changed from in favour to against. This can be attributed to the strong stand taken by certain Arab and Latin American states and by the Soviet bloc, in the case of Finland.

LAW OF THE SEA

It is almost incredible to think that because of one vote the community of nations should be denied a rule of law. We can fully appreciate the deep disappointment which our delegation must feel after having worked so diligently for the success of the Conference.

2. So far as we have been able to ascertain no repeat no fruitful consideration has yet been given in the State Department to possible ways and means of salvaging the measure of agreement which was achieved at the Conference. At least they have come up with nothing new.

3. I notice, that in this morning's Washington Post, both in an editorial and in a news item, Dean is reported as having suggested that there was a chance that the fifty-four nations which voted for the joint proposal might sign a treaty of their own and register it with [the] UN. We checked with the office of the Law of the Sea at the State Department concerning this reported suggestion but up until this morning they had received no repeat no report from Geneva concerning it.

4. Our own Delegation in Geneva is in the best position to assess what possibilities, if any, remain to exploit the substantial measure of agreement achieved. No repeat no doubt every effort is being made to maintain UN framework for further negotiations. In the latter connection, one possibility, I suppose, would be the calling of a special session of the General Assembly. This would involve obvious difficulties which might well outweigh any possible achievement. Additionally there would be the problem of the loss of support of those countries which are not repeat not members of UN itself. The Delegation may have something else in mind. We have, I fear, nothing else to put forward from here.

Note du haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from High Commissioner in United Kingdom to Prime Minister

[London], May 6, 1960

In view of Mr. Macmillan's request yesterday that you discuss with him the present situation in regard to the Law of the Sea, and possible courses which might be followed, I am enclosing a memorandum covering the suggestions which have been made already by many of those countries which voted for our proposal at Geneva.

I am also enclosing a copy of our proposal† which received 54 votes in favour, 28 against (including Chile, Ecuador, Peru, India, Iceland and Yugoslavia), with 5 abstentions (Cambodia, El Salvador, Iran, Japan and the Philippines). I am also enclosing the amendment to our proposal, presented by Brazil, Cuba and Uruguay. It carried by the overwhelming majority of 58 votes in favour, 19 against, with 10 abstentions.

Our proposal conformed in exact terms with that which we had put before the United Kingdom in London in June, 1959,[44] except that the Phasing Out Period was 10 years instead of 5. This was fully covered by our instructions.

After the utmost effort through diplomatic channels and at the Conference itself, we fell 1/2 vote short of a clear two-thirds majority. Had any one of the countries which voted "No" simply abstained, the vote obtained was sufficient.

Before another conference could be held new countries will be formally declared independent and would doubtless be represented at that conference. It would seem, therefore, that the chances of gaining a two-thirds majority for our position will diminish instead of increasing in the future.

Several of the countries which supported us at Geneva have indicated their belief that the best way to deal with this question is to proceed without delay to obtain approval of a Convention, signed by as many as possible of the 54 countries which stood together at Geneva.

Since our proposal, with the amendment I have mentioned, represents the combined effort of a world-wide group of countries representative of every area, the opinion has been expressed that it would be best to take that resolution and the amendment without change and, by an exchange of communications, obtain the assent of those who approve of this course. It is estimated that at least 40 countries would join immediately and that others would follow. In fact it is thought that a number of those which either abstained or voted against us might also join in the not distant future.

In answer to any suggestion that this does not cover all the countries in the world, it should be recalled that Russia, most of the Arab States, and several of the South American countries had made it perfectly clear that under no circumstances would they withdraw from the 12-mile territorial sea in any event. It is clear, therefore, that by the procedure of adopting a Convention almost precisely the same result would be obtained as would have been obtained if we had gained a two-thirds majority. In fact it could come into effect much more quickly.

It may be well to bear in mind that those states which supported our joint proposal do more than 3/4 of the world's fishing, more than 80% of the world's commercial fishing, and more than 90% of the world's commercial flying.

If under the Convention it were agreed that all the signing states would apply this Convention on their own coastal waters, and accept them on the coastal waters of other states, then practically everything would be achieved which we had hoped to achieve after very hard work at Geneva the week before last.

There is general agreement that, if such a Convention were in force over a period of even 10 years, the International Court of Justice would have little choice, in any case coming before it in regard to the subject matter of the Convention, to declare that this had already become a generally accepted rule of law and that it is the only discernible rule of law now in existence. When that happened we would then have established the same position as we would have established by a two-thirds majority at Geneva.

I submit that this is something which should be dealt with immediately. A strong sentiment has been built up throughout the world in support of a proposal which, in exact detail, is the Canadian proposal of two years ago, modified only by the reservation which we ourselves proposed in London last June with the full approval of the Canadian Government. Insofar as the additional amendment is concerned, this creates no disadvantage to Canada of any kind, and could in fact at some time in the future be of immense advantage to us on the east and west coasts because a special provision for those areas particularly dependent upon fishing would certainly apply to a great part of the east and west coasts. In any event, it can be said that by no stretch of the imagination does it create any disadvantage for Canada.[45]

Under these circumstances, it seems reasonable that Canada should continue to take the initiative in trying to gain acceptance of its own proposal for which it has been working so hard for more than two years. If the flood of sentiment in support of this proposal is allowed to ebb, then it may be very difficult to revive the spirit which displayed itself in such vigorous form in Geneva two weeks ago.

The diplomatic representatives of at least 15 of the countries which supported this proposal at Geneva have spoken to me in the past few days expressing the hope that what they regard as the Canadian proposal should be made effective in the form of a Convention as soon as possible. This sentiment has been expressed by coastal states, as well as distant fishing states.

There is a very strong reason why we should try to have our proposal made effective, in the only way it can now be done. No country in the world benefits as much as we do from the 105 Articles which were approved at Geneva two years ago. This is not yet effective law. Many of the countries which are anxious to make the Conventions of 1958 effective have been waiting until a definite decision had been made in regard to the measurement of the territorial sea and the fishing zone.

Whaling and sealing conv[entio]n [J.G. Diefenbaker].

By giving effect to our proposal in the form of a Convention at an early date, we could assure that the other 105 Articles would also obtain the necessary legislative approval and become a part of international law. I need not recall that this embraces such vitally important subjects to us as the measurement of base lines, and the law relating to the Continental Shelf and the exploitation of the resources in that area. These are two of the most important, but only two, of the many great advantages we gain from the earlier Convention. If the effective implementation of those earlier Conventions alone were the only reason for taking the initiative in obtaining a Convention covering the territorial sea and the fishing zone, they would justify that course in themselves.

One of the great advantages of making a decision without delay is that the Prime Ministers' Meeting now affords the opportunity to explore this subject with the heads of government which all supported our proposal, with the single exception of India. It is possible that with the obvious advantages of settling some known law Prime Minister Nehru might now be willing to sign such a Convention.

In every case of this kind, the question naturally arises as to whether there should be some delay to consult expert advice. The expert advice on this subject was represented by officials from Ottawa who were at Geneva. At a meeting held before we left Geneva, they expressed their unanimous support for a Convention which would incorporate our proposal in the manner which has been suggested. Those experts included the Legal Adviser of the Department of External Affairs, our leading expert on fisheries, and the Dean of the Law School of the University of British Columbia.[46] No questions in regard to fishing rights, treaties, or matters of that kind are involved. It would simply involve the support, and I would hope the initiative, for a plan which would put into effect the explicit proposals which have been given such careful consideration by the Canadian Government and approved with the advice of all the experts available.

The only question which could be raised would be as to whether this might have any effect on the settlement of any outstanding questions between the United States and Canada in relation to fishing rights. The advantage will be entirely in our favour in carrying out any negotiations in regard to treaties or other questions relating to fishing rights when a Convention is signed which formally extinguishes fishing rights along our coasts to a distance of 12 miles from the new base lines to be measured under the Conventions of 1958. Our bargaining power in reaching satisfactory conclusion with the United States will be infinitely greater when any question of historic rights has been extinguished by a Convention of this kind. Insofar as the 10-year Phasing Out Period is concerned, we would probably need most of that period in any event to measure the base lines around our coasts and to complete the negotiations which the Canadian Government suggested last October should be undertaken, but which the United States asked to have deferred until after the Conference. The period of adjustment is little more than we ourselves need to carry out the details of the 1958 Conventions and to carry out our necessary negotiations with the United States. If a new Convention is signed covering the proposal put forward at Geneva during the last Conference, then we enter into those negotiations with the greatly added bargaining power which will be in our hands as the result of a binding decision that historic rights have been extinguished subject only to the 10-year period of adjustment.

For the reasons I have put forward, I would hope that it may be possible for this subject to be discussed with the other Prime Ministers during the course of the next week.

Memorandum from Chairman, Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters, to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 161-60 [Ottawa], May 16, 1960
SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

LAW OF THE SEA — POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION

The attached memorandum dated May 13, 1960 was submitted to the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters by its Interdepartmental Committee in the form of a Memorandum to Cabinet. The Cabinet Committee at its meeting of May 16 considered and approved it.

The memorandum examines the four courses open to the Canadian Government following the failure of the Second United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea and concludes for the six reasons given on pages 3 and 4 that the multilateral approach offers the best solution. While a preliminary and necessarily tentative estimate indicates that some 45 countries might be willing to sign, it would be unwise to proceed with this approach until it is known that there is, in fact, sufficient support, especially from amongst the major maritime and air transport nations of the world. A delay would diminish the chances of success of such an approach. Consequently the recommendation which is endorsed by the Cabinet Committee is that Canada proceed immediately if the support which might be forthcoming would justify opening for signature a multilateral convention based on the joint Canada-United States proposal, which was introduced at the recent Law of the Sea Conference.

In order to have some indication of the articles which might be included in a possible multilateral convention, I requested that a draft convention be prepared. A copy is attached for your information.†

Projet d'une note pour le Cabinet

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY. [Ottawa], May 13, 1960

LAW OF THE SEA — POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION

The failure of the Second United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea to reach agreement on the breadth of the territorial sea and the fishing zone has left four courses open to the Canadian Government:

1. Take no action;
2. Take unilateral action;
3. Negotiate a series of bilateral agreements;
4. Support a multilateral convention embodying the provisions of the joint Canadian-United States proposal.

Circumstances are such that an early decision is urgently required.

No Action

National interests involved would seem to compel us to take one of the three positive courses of action suggested. As is indicated in the discussion in this memorandum a multilateral convention (course No. 4) is a practicable solution only if it is entered into in the near future. Therefore, if no action is taken, course No. 4 would be eliminated as a possibility leaving only courses 2 and 3 open to the Government. The disadvantages of both of these are discussed in the following paragraphs.

Unilateral Action

This might involve serious difficulties under International Law. If such action were taken in the near future, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Spain, Portugal and other countries which are opposed to broader limits could challenge our action and it is not certain what the decision of the International Court would be. Furthermore such a course is not in line with statements made by the Government that we favour the orderly development of international law and, by implication, oppose unilateral decisions.

If at all, this course could only be followed after a large number of nations had already adopted it and when there appeared to be no alternative. If, at that time, many countries had taken a similar course, our chances before the Court would be much better. If Canada were however to extend unilaterally its limits in the immediate future there would be strong reactions from the United States and like-minded countries which, at this juncture, particularly, can be expected to take measures to discourage a general movement beyond six miles. This would place us in a difficult position.

It is probable that the United States would not find it advisable to use force to resist our claims but the powerful fishing industry lobby influence in the United States would be brought to bear to our detriment in regard to a number of measures which might be considered by the United States Congress. It may be relevant to mention here that the most important market for Canadian fish is in the United States. Furthermore, unilateral action by us would re-open an area of contention on fishing which existed for a century between Canada and the United States. While the United States Government might not retaliate directly, the fund of goodwill available to Canada might be seriously affected and there might be repercussions in other areas of critical importance to us. It is unlikely in such circumstances that the United States would have any sympathy towards our claims to the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, the waters of the Arctic Archipelago, Dixon entrance and Hecate Strait.

Furthermore, if Canada took unilateral action this would undoubtedly encourage other countries to claim more than a six mile territorial sea and this is not in our security interests because a wider limit affects the deployment of Western naval forces which are largely designed to operate on the surface without having a similar effect on the Russian submarine fleet. Because of this, NATO security interests would be seriously compromised.

Bilateral Negotiations

If Canada decided to achieve its aims through bilateral negotiations, the measure of agreement reached at Geneva and the efforts expended in achieving it would be entirely lost. Instead we would be forced to begin a difficult series of negotiations with a number of countries which have an interest in fishing off our coasts. When faced with strong opposition to our demands from most of these countries, it is unlikely that Canada would succeed in satisfactorily settling differences with any one of them in terms more advantageous than those which were worked out in Geneva.

This is particularly true as regards the United States and France. At Geneva, the Americans and the French made concessions on historic fishing rights only because they hoped to obtain a rule of law on the territorial sea which would meet their security interests. In the absence of this result it is reasonable to assume that the Americans and the French will be unwilling to make the same concessions on fishing except in return for benefits which they would consider of equal importance. It is unlikely, therefore, that Canada would obtain the same concessions in bilateral agreements that we obtained at Geneva, and improbable that we would obtain additional ones, either in reducing the 10-year phasing out period or in regard to claims relating to waters along our coasts.

If we were to take no action, in the absence of an agreed multilateral arrangement, it seems to us that the security situation will deteriorate to the point where, from the United States point of view the strategic aspects of the negotiations will become irrelevant: as a result, as time goes on, the problem as regards the United States is likely to emerge more and more in terms of fishing and, such being the case, the prospects of agreement with them will correspondingly diminish.

Multilateral Approach

It would appear that the third solution providing for a multilateral convention based on the Canada-United States joint proposal would best serve the Canadian interest. It has six main advantages:

1. It represents the maximum which the Americans and Western Europeans are willing to concede;

2. It would meet our security needs by consolidating a six-mile rule for the territorial sea;

3. It would serve Canada's interests internationally since it would tend to stabilize the situation in wide areas of the high seas, and thereby prevent disputes which could be a source of embarrassment (or even danger) to Canada and the West generally.

4. By nullifying the effects of the narrow and somewhat accidental defeat at Geneva, it would enable Canada to carry to a successful fruition an important diplomatic initiative; what is a substantially Canadian proposal will emerge in the Convention in a form as satisfactory to the Canadian Government as that which could have been adopted in Geneva.

5. It will encourage countries to ratify the four Conventions on the Law of the Sea adopted in 1958. The advantages to Canada under these Conventions are substantial and every effort should be made to consolidate them. Of particular importance to Canada is the Article of the Convention on Territorial Waters providing for the straight baseline system. International recognition of this principle would be of considerable advantage to Canada in enclosing the waters of the Canadian Arctic Archipelago as internal waters. Canada would also benefit by the coming into force of the Convention on the Continental Shelf permitting the exploitation of the resources of this Shelf. The provisions in the Convention on High Seas Fishing concerning conservation are also of substantial benefit to us.

6. Finally, a multilateral convention signed by a large number of countries is likely to be accepted by the International Court of Justice, especially in view of the fact that 54 countries voted for the joint proposal at Geneva, and would become a rule of law. Third parties (such as the Soviet Union) could therefore be excluded from fishing within twelve miles of Canada's coasts. This advantage is available only under this course of action.

There are five possible criticisms of the multilateral approach for Canada:

1. It would take the question outside the United Nations which by convening two conferences has tried to provide a framework for agreement on the Law of the Sea. There is no doubt that the United Nations solution would have been the best one but since it has twice failed the choice must be made between an imposed inaction or to act in a perfectly legal way according to established precedents.

– This would not be the first time that states have been obliged to go outside the United Nations in order to protect their interests and in particular provide for their security.

Regional systems of defence were set up after the idea of collective security within the United Nations had failed.

– There is no reason why Conventions need to be negotiated under the aegis of the United Nations and in fact, many of them are not.

– In this case we would be going outside the United Nations because of the stubborn and uncooperative attitude of the opponents of the joint proposal who preferred failure of the Conference to the proposal's success. We need not be condemned to inactivity because of the wishes of a minority of states.

– In any event, the multilateral convention would be registered with the United Nations under Article 102 of the Charter.

2. The signing of a multilateral agreement by a number of states might inspire the Soviet bloc and Arab countries to sponsor a competing agreement of their own providing for a 12-mile territorial sea.

– While this is a danger to be faced it must be remembered that even if the joint Canadian-United States proposal had been adopted, it is unlikely that it would have been ratified by most of the Soviet or Arab countries, which might in fact have signed a separate agreement of their own.

– A point to consider is that if a Convention providing for a 12-mile territorial sea were to be introduced it would attract many newly independent states unless an alternative convention were available for them.

3. It might be contended that our continued advocacy of a rule of law based on an agreement acceptable to the United States and the United Kingdom on the territorial sea and fishing limits might lose friends for Canada. However, a study of the voting at Geneva indicates that only two countries (India and Iceland) with whom Canada has special relations voted against the joint proposal.

The Indian vote can be related, it is believed, to the personal views of Krishna Menon because of the failure of the Indian delegation at the First Conference to obtain approval of an article requiring states to seek prior authorization for the passage of warships through the territorial waters of other states. India, which was not prepared itself to table such an amendment, insisted at the Second Conference that a provision on the passage of warships be incorporated in the joint proposal even though this was completely outside the terms of reference for that Conference. The Indian delegate himself, on a number of occasions privately said that the joint proposal was a good one which deserved to win. If a multilateral convention should be open for signature it is unlikely that India would sign in the immediate future but their continued opposition would, as in the past, be based on grounds other than hostility to Canada's role.

Canada has special ties of friendship with Iceland. If we proceed with the idea of a multilateral convention against which Iceland twice showed its opposition at Geneva it is possible that the Icelanders would accuse us of deserting them again in favour of the United Kingdom.

– While, it is true, that in the past our positions on the Law of the Sea have been close with Iceland it is necessary to remember, however, that at Geneva Iceland voted consistently with the Soviet bloc and Arab countries and showed no concern about the success of the Conference.

– It displayed the utmost rigidity in its negotiations with the United Kingdom although the latter had made several important concessions designed to meet the Icelandic demands. For example, the United Kingdom gave evidence of willingness to recognize a position similar to that of Iceland's by concluding an agreement with Denmark over the Faroes which reduced the tapering off period for the exercise of historic fishing rights from ten years to a five year period. Iceland would have been able to obtain at least an equal concession on this question from the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom gave a further earnest of its willingness to make concessions by stating that it was prepared to submit its dispute with Iceland to arbitration.

– Iceland's failure to make any positive response lost for Iceland the sympathy of the large number of countries which voted against (48 with 15 abstentions) Iceland. All Scandinavian countries (except Finland, which abstained) voted against Iceland.

– The large vote against Iceland can be explained, in part, by the fact that Iceland's problems can only be solved by a special formula. To incorporate this in a general rule of law would make the latter so broad that many states, for varying reasons, could not accept it. At the same time, of course, the difficulties which would face Iceland under a rule which did not take into account its special position, would be unacceptable.

– Although opposed to the Canadian-United States proposal it is clear that Iceland stood to gain substantial benefits under it. It would have gained a six mile territorial sea immediately, exclusive fishing rights in a twelve mile fishing zone after a ten year (or very likely much shorter) phasing-out period and, under the amendment on preferential rights, exclusive fishing rights in certain areas of the high seas outside its twelve mile fishing zone.

– If it is possible to devise a special formula to solve Iceland's special position, it is very likely that Iceland would sign the proposed multilateral convention.

4. It may appear that by canvassing for a multilateral convention and later by sponsoring it, Canada is unduly identifying itself with the larger Western Powers, in particular the United States and the United Kingdom and is not following an independent course. However, it will be obvious that the proposed multilateral convention itself is based essentially on Canadian ideas that the United States and other Western countries were forced to give up their positions, and that it is now being advanced once again on Canadian initiative. If after confidential soundings, it appeared that there is majority support for a multilateral convention, the extent of the Canadian initiative could be underlined by suggesting that Ottawa be the site for the signature of the Convention. In view of the large role which Canada has played in the Law of the Sea since 1958, there would be considerable justification for proposing that the Convention be signed in Ottawa.

5. It could be argued that if Canada were to take another initiative in favour of a multilateral convention and this were to fail, our national prestige would be affected. However, it must be remembered that initiative would not be taken publicly until a canvass of countries was taken and success was assured.

We have learned that certain United States officials are favourably disposed to the idea of a multilateral convention but that they have tentatively expressed certain preliminary reservations. They believe that if less than half the countries of the world (approximately 44) signed such a Convention, this would indicate that at Geneva "many countries went along with the joint proposal only reluctantly," and the position of its supporters would thereby be weakened. In these circumstances, the Americans wonder whether it could be contended that the Convention made International Law.

It appears to us that the dangers which the Americans foresee need not arise if a confidential canvas of countries is made and used as a basis of deciding whether to proceed or not. It is clear that a formal initiative should not be undertaken unless the survey discloses that the major maritime and air transport nations of the world and in particular the United States would be prepared to sign the proposed Convention; if the Convention is to be effective and become a source of international law this is essential.

Our present assessment indicates that approximately 45 countries might be willing to become signatories of the Convention while 4 others (Japan, Italy, Switzerland and the Holy See) may sign. (See attached annex.†) Developments within even the next few days (e.g. certain countries taking unilateral action) could vary these figures, hence the need for early action. Our assessment appears to be in line with the thinking of the United Kingdom authorities who have estimated that from 40 to 50 countries would become signatories of the Convention. Almost all of the Western European countries along with a significant and important group of countries from Asia, Africa and South America would be numbered among the 45. This wide geographic distribution of countries would strengthen the convention and achieve our ends from the security point of view. Once in force, the convention could attract other signatories from countries which supported the joint proposal in Geneva and from newly independent states.

In summary, our view is that there is likely to be wide support for the multilateral convention approach and that Canadian prestige cannot be compromised as no initiative will be taken unless and until success is assured.

Recommendation

As a result of canvassing for the opinion of countries on a multilateral agreement Canada would be in a position to decide whether to resume its initiative of the past two years and continue to give leadership in seeking a solution to this problem. This would not commit us to open a convention for signature but, if the decision to proceed were made, our prominent role throughout would enable us to press for having the convention signed in Ottawa. If we were to decide to take no action, others such as the United States and the United Kingdom might take the lead away from us; initiative on their part might prove embarrassing to us in view both of our past role and also of the public statements made to this course being followed. Additionally we consider that they would have less chance than ourselves for success. If action is to be taken, it needs to be taken in the very near future for the following reasons:

1. As time passes the support generated at Geneva will wane and a sufficient number of countries might lose interest to a point where it would not be possible to proceed.

2. Certain states, believing that the failure of the Conference has paralyzed the chief proponents of an international agreement, will themselves take unilateral action to protect their interests and their support might thereby be lost. (At the moment Norway is considering this course.)

3. The "twelve-milers" might open for signature a competitive convention in advance of us.

It is recommended that Canada proceed immediately to canvas confidentially countries to discover whether sufficient support might be forthcoming to justify opening for signature a multilateral convention based on the joint Canada-United States proposal which was introduced at the Second United Nations Law of the Sea Conference in Geneva.[47]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 263-60 [Ottawa], August 10, 1960
SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

SUGGESTED COURSE OF ACTION ON THE LAW OF THE SEA WITH THE UNITED STATES

A memorandum of May 13, 1960, surveyed the various courses of action open to Canada following the failure of the Second Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea to reach agreement on the breadth of territorial sea and exclusive fishing zone. The courses that we explored were:

1. Take no action;
2. Take unilateral action;
3. Negotiate a series of bilateral agreements, and
4. Support a multilateral convention embodying the provisions of the joint Canada-United States proposal.

The course of action recommended then was to pursue, in conjunction with the United States, a multilateral convention based upon the joint Canada-United States proposal made at Geneva. This called for adoption as a rule of international law of a six-mile territorial sea, and a six-mile exclusive fishing zone coupled with a ten-year phasing-out period for countries with historic fishing rights.

Before announcing publicly Canada's intentions to launch this initiative it was considered best to conduct a confidential canvass to ascertain how many of the countries which had endorsed the joint proposal at Geneva could be expected to support such a convention. Further, it was our view that such a canvass would offer little hope of gathering a substantial measure of support among nations unless done in conjunction with the United States.

The United States Administration has since been asked to join Canada in undertaking a canvass. They hesitated, however, to do so without some assurance that it would be widely supported. Our preliminary estimate was that between forty and fifty countries would be original signatories. The United States was more pessimistic in their estimate, which acknowledged only 32 likely supporters. This suggests that the United States may actually be averse to the conclusion of a multilateral convention, lest it should disrupt the status quo, which in fact suits both its defence and fisheries interests. Recently they seem to have courted delay by insisting that France is a key country without whose support a multilateral convention could not succeed. (In our estimation France must be viewed as one of the most difficult Western European countries to enlist as a supporter and will probably join a convention only after it has established wide Western European support.)

When Under-Secretary of State Dillon saw Couve de Murville earlier this month he raised the subject and later reported that France would be prepared to sign a treaty based on the Canada-United States proposal only if the United Kingdom were persuaded to reach a satisfactory agreement on the question of French fishing off the U.K. coasts. Mr. Dillon therefore concluded that "until progress is made on the Franco-British problem I see no possibility of further progress on a treaty."[48]

The manifest reluctance of the United States to participate in the promotion of a multilateral convention should probably now be acknowledged and a new decision seems called for as to what action Canada could take at this juncture. In principle it remains ideally preferable to approach the general problem of a territorial sea and fishing zone on the basis of a multilateral convention. We have no reason therefore, to relent in our endeavour to impress upon the United States the advantages of this solution and the desirability of their joining us in a canvass of opinion among other countries.

Regional agreements do not appear satisfactory in that each agreement will regulate fishing on only one coast. This would cause domestic repercussions from the Canadian fishermen on the coast which received the lesser protection. No action at all appears to be the least favourable in that Canadian fishing interests are looking for and expecting action.

Canada's best interests might call for some other positive measure, preferably before the 1961 fishing season, particularly in view of the number of countries already enforcing a 12-mile fishing zone and the continuation of this trend as evidenced by Norway which recently decided to extend its fishing zone to 12 miles. In fact, the legality of any such unilateral extension of an exclusive fishing zone seems to be accepted; at least, should it be called in question, a good case can be made in support of it in international law and on balance the International Court of Justice — since its decision in the Anglo-Norwegian fisheries case — would be likely to recognize it.

Thus a public pronouncement of Canada's intention to extend its fishing control to 12 miles may, in theory, serve our purpose, considering especially that without such prior unilateral action any fisheries agreements which we might advantageously seek to conclude with specific countries would not prevent them from fishing up to the limit of the territorial sea until such time as a declaration places us in a superior bargaining position (in that in any such bilateral agreement we would have a real advantage to offer).

Among the other countries which would be so considered the United States, of course, is of paramount significance. Theoretically it would not seem improper in view of the circumstances reported above for Canada now to point out to the United States Administration that by their negative attitude in regard to the Canadian initiative they have made clear their interest in preventing any action disruptive of the status quo; that if the present situation continues the Canadian Government will soon be under popular pressure to take some action to make up for the failure of the Geneva Conference to come up with a rule of law which would have gone some way to meeting the legitimate Canadian fisheries interests; and that the Canadian Government might reach the position where it would be forced to consider extending control over its fisheries to twelve miles from the shore.

The timing of our indication to the United States that we intend to unilaterally extend our fishing zone must be carefully considered. To make our intention known at the present time would probably be premature in that, should our threat to take unilateral action force the present administration to declare themselves unequivocally in support of a multilateral convention, this might become an election issue that might well have to be reversed if a new administration is elected in November. It seems, therefore, more realistic to contemplate the making of informal representations next fall asking the United States to support a confidential canvass. If the fact that a canvass was being undertaken by the United States and Canada should become public knowledge it could be explained away by pointing out that neither country is committed to any particular course of action but that both countries are of the opinion that it is best to know the trend of thinking amongst the various nations.

The danger in forcing an unequivocal declaration by the United States would subside after the election, even before the new President takes office on January 20, 1961. Although this danger would not exist following the election it is most doubtful that prior to installation the new administration would give an outright commitment to support either the canvass or the convention. If, following inauguration, the new administration also withholds its support for the canvass and convention, it would then become a matter for decision by Canada whether to declare officially to the United States Government that their failure to endorse a multilateral convention by a predetermined date would oblige the Canadian Government to consider taking some other course of action. It would have to be explained that the alternative required to preserve Canada's best interests would almost necessarily be a unilateral declaration of a twelve-mile exclusive fishing zone, coupled with a clear indication to all countries whose fleets have been traditionally fishing off Canada's coasts that Canada is prepared to enter into bilateral arrangements to provide a reasonable tapering-off period for historic fishing rights. It would be made clear at the same time that this form of action, while dictated by Canada's essential requirements, in no way affects the defence interests common to all NATO partners in that it leaves the breadth of the territorial sea unaltered.

Recommendation

It is recommended:

(a) That we continue to impress upon the United States Administration our view that the only satisfactory solution to the problem of the width of territorial sea and fishing zone is a multilateral convention. We should press for a confidential survey with United States support as this is likely to be the most that the Administration would be prepared to entertain at this time.

(b) That, if the United States refuse to join in a confidential survey, when the new United States Administration is installed, the Government might then consider if the United States should be told that if they do not quickly pledge support to a multilateral convention, Canada will be forced to consider seriously taking unilateral action and extend our fishing zone to 12 miles (subject to the conditions outlined above).[49]

LAW OF THE SEA; CONFIDENTIAL SURVEY TO DETERMINE SUPPORT FOR MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

33. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the attitude of the United States towards having a confidential survey made to see if a multilateral convention on the law of the sea was possible remained discouraging. The North Sea countries had decided to hold a regional conference in November concerning this subject. The initiative for the conference had been taken by the Netherlands who had proposed that a basis for agreement amongst those attending might be the joint Canada-U.S. proposal for a six-mile territorial sea plus a six-mile fishing zone, with a ten-year phasing out period for countries enjoying traditional fishing rights. The French now wanted to "improve" this by lengthening the phasing out period to maybe twenty years. If the Conference were to succeed on any other basis than the Geneva Formula, the chance of success for a wider solution would be disastrously reduced. The Norwegians were aware of the dangers and the British had their reservations.

In order to retain the measure of agreement reached so far at the Law of the Sea Conferences, it was no longer possible to await action by the U.S. Consequently, he recommended that discussions be held promptly with the U.K. and Norway. If one or both of these countries agreed, the U.S. should be informed that a confidential survey, to determine what support might be forthcoming for a multilateral convention would be undertaken. If the survey as it progressed showed support for the original Canada-U.S. proposal, the U.S. should also be told that Canada would expect the U.S. to join in completing the canvass and sign the convention when it was open for signature.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Memorandum, Prime Minister and Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, Sept. 22 — Cab. Doc. 307-60).†

34. Mr. Green said the course proposed seemed the only possible one. At the moment the U.S. simply was not interested.

35. The Cabinet agreed with the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that discussion be held with the United Kingdom and Norway on the possibility of undertaking a confidential survey to determine what support existed for a multilateral convention on the law of the sea, as outlined in the memorandum of September 22nd, (Cab. Doc. 307-60).

LAW OF THE SEA

Over the weekend, I have received telegrams from Mr. Drew concerning the law of the sea. One of these (3372 of November 4, copy attached,† 3375 of November 7, copy attached†) dealt with the suggestion made by the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations that a meeting of Norwegian, Canadian and British officials be held to discuss the prospects of the initial confidential survey which we have suggested and the tactics to be adopted.

I share Mr. Drew's disappointment that the British (and subsequently the Norwegians) would wish to discuss the probable results of the restricted survey when the purpose of the survey itself is to determine what support might be forthcoming from a few (possibly not more than 20) selected countries. There is, however, some merit in the suggestion that tactics be discussed and rather than delay the project, I think we should agree to the meeting, but attempt to confine its discussions largely to the questions of which countries should be approached (and by whom) and to the nature of the approaches themselves. Attached is telegram No. L-306† which is the reply I propose to send.[50]

You will note in paragraph 7 of Mr. Drew's telegram that he has suggested that you might send a letter to Mr. Macmillan in order to expedite things. However, I think because of the reply I propose sending concerning the meeting that such a high level approach is not required at the moment. It is, however, a useful suggestion and one which, if you agree, we might keep in reserve on the chance that delays are encountered because of possible United Kingdom insistence that the results of a confidential survey must be known before it is undertaken. With this in mind, I have had prepared a telegram (L-307 — attached)† to Mr. Drew. Would you let me know whether you agree that this reply might go out.[51]

LAW OF THE SEA — CONFIDENTIAL SURVEY TO DETERMINE SUPPORT FOR MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

As you know, in accordance with Cabinet instructions discussions have been going on in London this week at the official level, between ourselves, the British, and the Norwegians concerning the Canadian proposal for a joint preliminary confidential survey of countries selected on the basis of likelihood of support, geographical distribution and importance of fishing or shipping interests, the results of which we hope could be used as a basis

(a) for determining the likelihood of more general support for a multilateral convention and

(b) for persuading the United States to join with us in a wider survey.

The attached telegram 3718 of December 9† from London reports that unanimous agreement was reached as to the basis upon which recommendations would be made to the respective governments that approval be given for immediate action. The recommendations are contained in a memorandum, the text of which is set out in full in the attached telegram 3719 of December 9 from London.

The recommendations appear to be eminently reasonable, and in fact represent very closely the Canadian position on the question.

Since Cabinet has approved both the idea of the preliminary initial survey and the wider canvass (if it is undertaken with United States' support) the only aspect on which Mr. Drew might require confirmation at this stage is on the Governments to be approached, and by whom. Those listed in Annex A to the memorandum given in telegram 3719 qualify under the classification which Cabinet approved, and the "sounding countries" are logical. I have accordingly drafted a telegram to London and Oslo for your signature, if you agree, confirming your approval of the memorandum and authorizing Mr. Drew and Dr. MacKay to so notify the United Kingdom and Norwegian authorities.[52]

LAW OF SEA

A. Following is text of memorandum.

"The prospects of a multilateral convention on the breadth of the territorial sea and fishery limits based on Geneva (1960) formula.

1. The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Canadian High Commissioner and Norwegian Ambassador met at the Foreign Office on December 8 and agreed to recommend to the three governments represented that a confidential survey be undertaken with a view to establishing whether or not repeat not it might be feasible to conclude a multilateral convention of the breadth of the territorial sea and fishery limits based on the formula which obtained the maximum support at the 1960 Conference. If governments agree, it is proposed:

(a) that the reactions of the eighteen states listed in the annex be obtained by the 3 governments as shown to a proposal for a multilateral convention based on the Geneva Formula. The governments concerned should simply be asked whether they would, in principle, favour the conclusion of a multilateral convention. The possibility of such a convention would depend upon the importance (from a shipping and fishing point of view), the number, and the geographical distribution of the states prepared to accept it. The instructions to the representatives of the 3 governments would be coordinated;

(b) that USA be informed of the decision to conduct the preliminary survey in (a) above and be invited to instruct its missions in the countries concerned to express at least a benevolent interest;

(c) that France and Belgium also be informed that the survey is being undertaken;

(d) that after discussing the matter with USA officials, Canada should decide whether or not repeat not to inform Brazil and Argentina that consideration is being given to the conclusion of a multilateral convention; and

(e) that as soon as the preliminary survey has been completed there should be another meeting to consider the result and decide what further steps should be taken.

2. Canadian representative stated that his government were prepared to start the operation at once. Norwegian and UK representatives explained that their governments wished to consider the matter before committing themselves to take soundings."

LAW OF THE SEA

Mr. Drew's telegram of December 23, 1960 (number 3891)† reported that the United Kingdom Government have joined Canada in approving the memorandum of agreement arrived at by officials representing the Norwegian, the United Kingdom and the Canadian governments at meetings which took place in London on December 7 and December 8. You have asked for an outline of the steps which are now to be taken.

We have yet to hear from the Norwegian Government but their reply should not, I think, be long delayed.

Meanwhile, in accordance with the agreement reached at the London meetings we are preparing a first draft of instructions to be sent to the representatives of the United Kingdom, Norway, and Canada in the capitals of the 18 countries to be approached in the first phase of the survey. It is expected that this will be submitted to you for your consideration early next week. This first draft would be transmitted to London and Oslo for the consideration and eventual approval of the United Kingdom and Norwegian authorities. Action in capitals would be closely co-ordinated between the missions of the three countries. The approaches would be made by one country only in the first instance and, in certain cases, would be supported by a second country.

If it is agreed that this preliminary confidential survey be undertaken the United States authorities in Washington will be informed by the Canadian Embassy of the decision and invited to instruct their missions in the 18 countries concerned to express at least a benevolent interest in the project. Supporting action would be taken by the United Kingdom and Norwegian Embassies in Washington.

It is hoped that these preliminary steps will be completed by mid-January and that the reactions of the 18 countries selected at the London meetings be obtained by the three governments to the proposal for a multilateral convention based on the Geneva Formula. The governments concerned will simply be asked whether they would in principle favour the conclusion of a multilateral convention.

The final step in this phase of the project would be the holding of another meeting of the representatives of the three governments to consider the result of the survey and to consider what further steps should be taken. The Norwegian Government is under pressure from the Norwegian fishing industry to extend Norway's fishing limits early in April through the passage of appropriate legislation. In order to meet the requirements of the Norwegian situation it would be desirable to have the results of the first phase of the survey in hand before the end of February and to assess these results early in March.[53]

LAW OF THE SEA — PRELIMINARY CONFIDENTIAL CANVASS OF COUNTRIES CONCERNING A MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

As you know, the United Kingdom Government has agreed to participate in the preliminary confidential survey, (London's telegram number 3891† of December 23, a copy of which is attached), while the Norwegian Government has declined to do so, for domestic reasons, (Oslo's telegram number 222† of December 23, a copy of which is also attached). However, the memorandum of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters dated September 22 and approved by Cabinet on October 1 recommended that the survey be carried out "if one or both of these countries" (the British and the Norwegians) "are agreeable." There is Cabinet authority therefore for proceeding with the survey without the Norwegians.

The Norwegian action is, of course, disappointing but as Mr. Drew has pointed out they had been assigned a very limited role in the survey which is to be conducted. If the survey is conducted promptly and produces satisfactory results we may still be able to count on Norwegian co-operation at a later stage. You will note that in refusing to participate now they renewed their "strong preference for a multilateral convention" and expressed their hope that we and the British would go ahead with the canvass.

I concur in Mr. Drew's suggestion that we launch the project immediately in order to avoid having it stalled indefinitely. It was agreed at the December meeting in London that Canada should prepare the initial letter of instructions to missions in those countries being approached, subject to the approval of its wording by the British, and at that time, the Norwegians. This therefore is the next step in the operation. I have accordingly drafted for your signature, if you agree, the attached telegram to London requesting that the approval of the United Kingdom authorities be obtained as soon as possible to a draft letter of instructions to the United Kingdom and Canadian missions in question, the text of which is contained in the telegram.[54]

LAW OF THE SEA

I share your concern at the possibility that unless immediate action is taken to launch the project it may be stalled indefinitely and I agree that we should proceed with all due haste. Would you therefore submit to the U.K. authorities, for their approval, the draft letter of instructions, the text of which follows:

"Since the joint Canada-United States "six plus six" proposal failed by the narrow margin of one vote to gain the required two-thirds majority at the Second Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea, (a table of the voting is attached),† consideration has been given in various capitals to the courses which might offer the best way out of the impasse in which the large number of supporters of the joint proposal have been placed.

Purpose of Preliminary Survey

For your information, the United States declined this summer to participate in a confidential survey, the purpose of which would have been to determine the extent of support for a multilateral convention based on the joint Canada-United States proposal. Consequently the United Kingdom and Canadian governments have decided to undertake a joint preliminary confidential survey restricted to certain key countries, (which have been selected on the basis of likelihood of support, geographical distribution and importance of shipping or fishing interests) the results of which, it is hoped, can be used as a basis:

(a) for determining the likelihood of more general support for a multilateral convention, and

(b) for persuading the United States to join in a wider survey. (It is considered that U.S. support is probably vital to the eventual successful conclusion of a multilateral convention).

Proposed Plan of Action

Attached as Annex "A" is a list of the eighteen countries which will be canvassed in the first (or preliminary) survey.[55] You are requested to make representations at the highest level possible to the country to which you are accredited to enlist its support for a multilateral convention based on the Canada-United States "six plus six" formula put forth at the 1960 Geneva Conference. As appears from Annex "A", certain countries will be approached by both the U.K. and Canada, and it will be necessary in such cases for the missions of our two countries to consult with one another so as to insure that these approaches are coordinated. Where dual approaches are intended the country the country named second will make the follow-up approach.

The government of the country being approached should be informed that it is intended that the operation shall be conducted in three stages:

(1) a preliminary confidential survey restricted to certain key countries, which, if the results are encouraging, will be followed by

(2) a wider, more complete survey of countries, which, if the results confirm and augment those of the preliminary survey, will be followed by

(3) the opening for signature of a multilateral convention.

It is intended that the following countries should be informed about the intentions of the U.K. and Canada to conduct this preliminary survey:

(a) The U.S.A.: The U.S. will be approached both before and after the first stage. The Canadian Embassy will first approach the U.S. authorities in Washington to inform them of the decision to conduct the preliminary survey and invite them to instruct their missions in the eighteen countries concerned to express at least a benevolent interest in the project. Supporting action would be taken by the United Kingdom Embassy there. The active support of the U.S. for the project will not be requested until the conclusion of the first phase.

(b) France and Belgium: It is considered that in view of their participation in the forthcoming North Sea Conferences to be held at The Hague, France and Belgium would be bound to learn about the proposed survey. For reasons of general policy, the United Kingdom could not avoid informing them of the project in general terms.

(c) Argentina and Brazil: Because of certain doubts, based on reasons which appear below it has been agreed that Canada should decide, after raising the matter with United States officials, whether or not to inform Argentina and Brazil in general terms that consideration is being given to the conclusion of a multilateral convention. It is considered that these two countries should probably be informed unless the United States should express strong objections which might prejudice the chances of its participating in the second phase of the survey.

Possible Doubts Concerning Survey

It should be stressed that the results of this preliminary survey will be kept confidential. Should anyone express the fear that an unsuccessful preliminary survey may be "counter productive" you should explain that it is recognized that if the initial survey discloses that the majority of the shipping and fishing countries do not favour a multilateral convention then the idea is dead. The initial survey will not however have worsened the situation, since its results will be kept confidential except amongst those countries approached. If nothing else, the results could make clear that support for the Geneva Formula had waned since the Second Conference to a point where even perhaps with U.S. assistance a convention would attract so few signatories that it would be ineffective. The position of no country would be improved by remaining in ignorance of this state of affairs (if it exists) and there would, in fact, be advantages of learning of it so that attention can be directed to other solutions.

Definition and Scope of Canada-United States Formula

The "Geneva Formula" comprises three main elements

(a) a territorial sea not exceeding six miles,

(b) an exclusive fishing zone not exceeding twelve miles (with a ten-year phasing out period in the outer six miles), and

(c) a procedure for examining claims to preferential fishing rights outside that zone. (The Brazilian Amendment)

In referring to the "Geneva Formula," however, the countries to be approached in the first phase of the survey should be asked only if they would in principle favour the conclusion of a multilateral convention "based on the Geneva Formula." No reference should be made, if it can be avoided, to the third element of the formula ((c) above). On the other hand nothing should be done or said which would prejudice one way or the other the possible retention or elimination of the "Brazilian Amendment." If the question is raised, any views in favour or against this provision expressed by the countries being approached should be reported immediately.

Arguments to Use

(a) The following general observations should be borne in mind in making these representations.

The initiative is in no sense a cold war project or an attempt to revenge the "diplomatic defeat" at Geneva. On the contrary, it is motivated by a desire to further the orderly development of international law, and in particular to complete the codification of the Law of the Sea so nearly achieved at the 1960 Geneva Conference. (One of the most telling arguments with some of the older and more conservative countries, who might not otherwise be favourably disposed towards the Convention, is that of the desirability of achieving uniformity and certainty of International Law, and this should not only be stressed in the initial approaches, but should, where appropriate, be followed up with the legal advisors to the foreign ministers in question.)

The general desirability of reaching agreement on the two important questions left unanswered is underlined by the present uncertainty and the likelihood of a continued drift towards chaos in the Law of the Sea. The sooner therefore that a multilateral convention can be concluded the sooner this disturbing drift can be stopped. It is hoped that if a multilateral convention is concluded, in time, enough countries will accede so as to obtain substantially the same purpose as would have been achieved at Geneva. For this reason the potential influence and importance from a shipping and fishing point of view of the countries acceding to such a convention is considered to be as important as the numbers concerned.

(b) Support for a multilateral convention at this stage, rather than later, would have a good chance of building on the large measure of agreement reached at the Conference and avoiding the loss of the effort put into it.

(c) The existence of an agreement would help to prevent disputes arising out of incidents on the seas and would encourage countries with outstanding disputes to arrive at an early solution.

(d) The movement to a twelve mile territorial sea would be slowed down and countries might be restrained from making more extravagant claims. Maximum freedom of the seas would thereby be ensured for security, navigational and commercial purposes.

(e) It would provide a convention to which new countries could adhere when they gain their independence.

(f) The convention, especially as it will number among its signatories the chief maritime and air transport nations of the world, would provide an important source of law from which a universal rule of law might gradually evolve.

(g) The conclusion of a multilateral conference on the remaining questions in issue might further encourage states to ratify conventions adopted by the 1958 Conference.

There may be other advantages of particular attraction to the country to which you are accredited, or, on the other hand, disadvantages peculiar to that country and you should draw on aide mémoires you may have presented before the Second Conference. Similarly, some of the points listed above might be dropped (or varied) if you believe that it would be inadvisable to use them in their present form or at all.

Provisional Assessment of U.N. Members

Attached for your background information as Annex "B" is the provisional assessment of the probable attitude of the 107 members (including Mauritania) of the U.N. and specialized agencies towards the idea of a multilateral convention which was agreed to at the meeting in London between senior officials of the U.K., Norway and Canada.†

It may be that certain other countries will be added to the original eighteen being canvassed but for the time being the list is limited to that number.

Preferential Rights Proviso

For your own information, the two surveying countries intend to give further consideration, in the light of the replies received, as to whether or not the balance of the advantages would lie in retaining or discarding the clause on preferential rights. (The Brazilian Amendment) There would appear at this stage to be two possible points of view on this question: on the one hand most Western European countries and probably also the United States would wish to see the provision eliminated, while on the other hand the Latin American countries, (in particular Brazil and Argentina, and to a lesser extent Chile) might not be prepared to support a proposal which did not contain the preferential rights proviso. Consequently Latin American countries have not been included in the list of countries to be approached in the first (or preliminary) survey.

It would be appreciated if you would treat this matter as one of importance and urgency. The desirability of keeping the operation secret from countries not being canvassed cannot be stressed too strongly."

2. You may approve on your own authority any changes in wording suggested by the British which you consider to be reasonable and not of a major substantive nature.

3. As to the proposed Annex "A" you may inform the U.K. authorities that we have no strong feelings as to which country should approach Sweden now that Norway will not be doing so, but since the British will presumably be approaching Denmark, it would seem appropriate for them to canvass Sweden as well. We could make follow-up approaches in both cases, if it is considered desirable.

4. I agree with the action you have taken in writing to Lord Home and I concur also in your suggestion that Rodgers deal with Godber along the lines indicated in your letter.

SECRET

At the meeting of the United States Secretary of State and the ambassadors of the four other Western nations on January 18, it was agreed that in the discussions which will begin January 25 the five Western delegations should develop in general terms a complete and far-reaching disarmament programme, whose first stage will comprise specific proposals which can be implemented in the present world political situation. The United Kingdom produced a paper[56] outlining a disarmament programme which was basically the same as that presented to the United Nations General Assembly by Mr. Lloyd,[57] with some added features. United States officials have indicated that they intend to accept the United Kingdom proposals as a basis of discussion. While the United States will doubtless have modifications to suggest, nothing was disclosed as to their nature. The French and Italians also said that they would be submitting papers for discussion, but it is thought that these are not likely to include topics additional to those in the United Kingdom programme.

2. The delegation will also discuss the USSR disarmament proposals put forward by Mr. Khrushchev in the General Assembly on September 18, 1959,[58] with the purpose of determining an agreed position on them.

3. The matter dealt with in the UK and USSR plans may be divided into a number of different aspects or phases of disarmament. The Canadian delegation will have to express views on these. While it would not seem useful at this time to develop a competing "Canadian disarmament programme," the delegation can endeavour to ensure that the programme finally agreed by the five Western nations should accord with certain principles. The following are suggested as principles which should guide the Canadian delegation in its representations, and which, taken together, can be considered as the initial Canadian position on disarmament.

(1) The ultimate object is to achieve the maximum of disarmament and reduction of military forces which can be verified and controlled, and which is compatible with the maintenance of adequate security against aggression.

(2) Disarmament must be accomplished in stages. However, the first stage should not consist merely of exchanges of information and studies of various aspects of disarmament to be put into effect later, but should include a substantial measure of actual disarmament.

[58] Voir/See Documents on International Affairs 1959, pp. 93-111.

(3) An international organization to verify and control disarmament as it is effected is necessary. It preferably should be an organ of or linked to the United Nations.

(4) A comprehensive plan for the prevention of surprise attack should be developed and presented to the five Eastern nations. Priority should be given to developing methods of controlling missiles capable of delivering nuclear weapons of mass destruction.

(5) The nations should agree not to use artificial earth satellites as carriers of nuclear or other offensive weapons.

(6) Reduction of conventional armaments should be effective in terms of weapons and equipment, rather than in terms of numbers of effectives.

(7) As national armaments are reduced, an international authority should be built up, disposing of military force capable of restraining aggression. The international authority preferably should be within the framework of the United Nations.

(8) Production of fissile material for weapons should be stopped, and existing stocks transferred to peaceful uses, as soon as a practical and controllable plan can be agreed upon.

(9) The manufacture and use of biological and chemical weapons in massive warfare should be banned.

4. It is, of course, to be understood that as the negotiations proceed, specific proposals relating to the several aspects of disarmament covered in the above principles will be developed, which will have to be referred to the Government for instructions.

5. A paper commenting in some detail on the United Kingdom programme for disarmament referred to in the first paragraph of this memorandum will be submitted to you shortly.

6. May the above principles be approved as a guide to the Canadian delegation in the forthcoming meetings of the five Western nations? If any of the principles as set forth are not approved, may instructions be given as to what modifications are necessary?

DISARMAMENT

(Previous reference December 30, 1959)

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that General Burns had proceeded to Washington to participate in the discussions on disarmament among representatives of the five Western nations, which had begun on January 25th. It was hoped that the meetings would develop in general terms a complete and far-reaching disarmament programme that might help to counteract the recent propaganda moves of Premier Khrushchev.

The United States some time previously had appointed the Coolidge Commission to study and report upon disarmament. The report had been received by the U.S. government but was understood to contain no major new suggestions. U.S. officials had indicated that they intended to accept the U.K. proposals as a basis for discussion at the Washington meetings. The British and French appeared to be keen to achieve an agreement on disarmament. The Italians had sent a strong delegate but seemed to regard their participation as a matter of prestige. The attitude of the U.S. toward disarmament seemed less clear. General Burns enjoyed great prestige among the delegations because of his high qualifications.

The Minister believed that the question of disarmament was of the greatest possible importance. A nuclear war could wipe out civilization. Canada's geographical position between the U.S. and U.S.S.R. made this country most vulnerable of all. Furthermore, it should not be lightly assumed that only the U.S.S.R. would pull the first trigger. Everything possible should be done to contribute to the success of the disarmament talks. Canada had a great opportunity in these discussions and the government should give General Burns every support.

The Canadian delegation had requested approval of a set of principles for guidance at the discussions. These principles taken together could be regarded as the initial Canadian position on disarmament. Any specific proposals arising during the negotiations would be referred to the government for instructions.

Explanatory memoranda had been circulated, (Memoranda, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Jan. 21 — Cab. Docs. 19-60 and 24-60).†

10. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) The U.K. disarmament proposal seemed to lack impact. There was a possibility, however, that the British had concluded that a more far-reaching proposal could not realistically be advanced at the subsequent meeting of the ten nations. The U.K. proposal had been accepted as a basis for discussion at the meetings of the five Western nations, but this did not preclude Canada from advancing alternatives there.

(b) The notion of an international authority with an effective military arm was far from new. It had been advanced by Castlereagh at the Congress of Vienna after the Napoleonic Wars, and by various delegates at the San Franciso Conference following World War II, but it remained a pious hope. The practical questions related to the national composition of such a force and to the place where it would be held. It could easily fall under the domination of one or two of its major contributors. Furthermore, it was unrealistic to expect a national contingent to participate in a police action against its own homeland. In present circumstances, the Secretary General of the United Nations could call upon Canada for a contribution toward an expeditionary force for a particular action, but its despatch would be subject to the prior approval of the government.

(c) Effective disarmament was becoming increasingly difficult because within a few years many of the nations would become nuclear powers. A disarmament conference which excluded Communist China appeared particularly truncated.

(d) The explanatory memorandum on the proposed Canadian position proposed that "the manufacture and use of biological and chemical weapons in massive warfare should be banned." This wording would appear to imply, wrongly, that Canada was prepared to support the use of these weapons in brushfire wars or against coloured peoples. For clarification, therefore, the words "in massive warfare" should be deleted.

(e) Some said that consideration might be given to the formation of an international group to protect the general public interest in the field of peaceful uses of atomic energy. A case in point might be "Operation Chariot," the U.S. proposal to create a harbour in Alaska in 1961 by exploding a nuclear device. Another might be similar to the former proposal to detonate a nuclear explosion in the Athabascan tar sands to obtain oil. Proponents of this view suggested that such an international group might provide a useful precedent in international co-operation, and might help to allay the "irrational" fear of radioactive fall-out that was giving rise to pacifistic activity at various universities.

(f) On the other hand, most members believed that Canada should not advocate a policy of permitting nuclear explosions for any purpose, peaceful or belligerent, until more was known about fall-out and particularly its possible genetic effects. The fear of fall-out was by no means irrational: on present knowledge the matter was terrifying.

11. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the following principles should guide the Canadian delegation at the meetings of delegations representing the five Western nations being held at this time in Washington:

(1) The ultimate object was to achieve the maximum of disarmament and reduction of military forces which could be verified and controlled, and which was compatible with the maintenance of adequate security against aggression.

(2) Disarmament must be accomplished in stages. However, the first stage should not consist merely of exchanges of information and studies of various aspects of disarmament to be put into effect later, but should include a substantial measure of actual disarmament.

(3) An international organization to verify and control disarmament as it was effected was necessary. It preferably should be an organ of or linked to the United Nations.

(4) A comprehensive plan for the prevention of surprise attack should be developed and presented to the five Eastern nations. Priority should be given to developing methods of controlling missiles capable of delivering nuclear weapons of mass destruction.

(5) The nations should agree not to use artificial earth satellites as carriers of nuclear or other offensive weapons.

(6) Reduction of conventional armaments should be specified in terms of weapons and equipment, rather than in terms of numbers of effectives.

(7) As national armaments were reduced, an international authority should be built up, disposing of military force capable of restraining aggression. The international authority preferably should be within the framework of the United Nations.

(8) Production of fissile material for weapons should be stopped, and existing stocks transferred to peaceful uses, as soon as a practical and controllable plan could be agreed upon.

(9) The manufacture and use of biological and chemical weapons should be banned; on the understanding that these principles taken together would constitute the initial Canadian position on disarmament, and that any specific proposals arising during the negotiations would be referred to the government for instructions.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY. Ottawa, March 7, 1960

INITIAL WESTERN POSITION ON DISARMAMENT

Before leaving for Paris General Burns informed you about the meeting held in my office on March 6 with General Foulkes, Mr. Bryce and departmental officers concerned. In the light of main French reservations about the Western position as stated in the draft of March 4, that is, the lack of provision for early measures of disarmament dealing with nuclear weapons, consideration was given to the Canadian attitude, as regards this French position and as regards the related proposals in the Western paper, developed in Washington. General Burns will require instructions for the Five Power conversations resuming in Paris on March 8. What is desirable is an agreed Western position for presentation to NATO on March 9, that is, only six days before negotiations with the Soviet side begin in Geneva.

It seems likely that the details of the Western position, whether divided or agreed, will shortly find their way into the press. Indeed, much of the substance of the position has already leaked to the press in the United States. It is, therefore, a matter of some concern that the attitudes of the various Western powers should be carefully defined, especially if there is not to be an agreed position.

The latest formulation of the Western position, a copy of which is attached,† does show the marked strengthening that has taken place since the initial presentation by the United States. This improvement has resulted from persistent and firm pressure by General Burns and his United Kingdom and French colleagues.

(a) The nine principles approved by Cabinet on January 25 have now been more or less incorporated in the paper, although there might be some reservation about the priority which has been given the measures involved.

(b) Several measures of special significance for an anxious public have been highlighted and moved as far forward within the plan as seems prudent and consistent with Western security needs.

(c) Matters of less immediate significance, but of apparent importance to the United States, such as the development of international peace-keeping machinery for safeguarded law and order in a situation of world disarmament, have been placed in a more realistic perspective, that is, at a later stage in the development of the disarmament programme.

(d) A change of importance to Canada is the inclusion of provisions for the conversion of fissionable material to peaceful uses after an agreed cut-off date for the production of such material for weapons purposes.

(e) Another recent change, which under instruction General Burns pressed for and obtained, is the inclusion of suitable references to the relationship between a disarmament programme and peace-keeping machinery, on the one hand, and the United Nations, on the other. The United States readily co-operated in making this addition once our views on this subject had been made known at a high level in the State Department.

What has so far been developed is only a suggested initial position. It will necessarily undergo refinement and change from time to time as negotiations with the USSR unfold. The considerable success which General Burns has had thus far in moving the United States from seemingly rigid positions, implies that we might well have future opportunities to exercise the same kind of influence in the months that lie ahead, as long as our demands on the United States were not believed by United States authorities to endanger the vital interests of Western security. In these circumstances external advice and pressure from its allies could assist the United States Government in developing its disarmament policies but those influences might also be counter-productive, if they were exerted too much in sensitive areas of United States opinion. Certainly, as far as Canada is concerned, it would seem to be a matter of self-interest to avoid any situation that might weaken the influence we might hope to have on United States policy making in the future in this very important field.

The note left with you on March 3 by the French Ambassador raises a matter of great importance to Canada. Our position, publicly and privately, has been that consistent with the needs of national and Western security, priority should be given to measures of disarmament involving nuclear weapons. A properly controlled disarmament agreement could be one means of halting and reducing the threat posed by the growing competition in the development of nuclear armaments. The basic position, taken in the French aide mémoire, is consistent with that approach and also with statements which have been made in Parliament and elsewhere about the Canadian attitude. However, although this French position can be reconciled in strict logic with France's programme for developing nuclear weapons, it is not altogether clear that France would be as concerned about nuclear disarmament if it possessed nuclear weapons in its own national arsenal. This might be one reason for wondering whether the French position, as stated in the aide mémoire, could be satisfied by any rearrangement of the Western disarmament plan.

In any event the Canadian attitude should not be simply to urge the United States, the United Kingdom and Italy to give in to French pressure. Rather we should seek, as far as possible, some acceptable means of reconciling the Western paper with the Canadian position, as it has been enunciated, on nuclear disarmament.

In essence the French demand appears to be that the West should be prepared to include nuclear weapons, other than large missiles, in declaration of armaments and agreement on limitation contemplated under heads E and F of Stage I. As presently drafted these heads apply only to "conventional weapons" which are defined in an agreed working paper as weapons of "non-nuclear capabilities."

So far, the United States and the United Kingdom have not been disposed to include nuclear weapons in their early stage proposals involving declarations about, limitations on, and sequestration of national armaments. They envisage measures of nuclear disarmament in Stage III, after reductions in conventional armaments have been successfully achieved under controls. As regards missiles and satellites, they have, however, provided in Stage I and II for prior notification of launching (involving the location of sites and on site inspection); and, as regards nuclear weapons, for a cut-off of production of fissionable material for weapons and a conversion of existing stocks of weapons to peaceful uses. To go beyond this at the beginning of negotiations with the USSR would, they argue, weaken the nuclear deterrent which they insist is the indispensable element for the security of all Western countries. Although Canadian experts would not quarrel about the need for the deterrent, it is open to argument whether a proposal to negotiate with the Soviet Union about reciprocal measures involving nuclear armaments does weaken the military position on either side, except in terms of public reaction which is worrying to Western governments involved in defence programmes. General Burns has previously pressed the United Kingdom and the United States for a full explanation of their opposition to including early measures involving nuclear weapons, but no adequate reply has been forthcoming yet. He will continue to press this question in Paris.

There are two preoccupations which may legitimately weigh heavily with the United Kingdom and the United States in their approach to nuclear disarmament:

(a) While the Soviet Union may have a lead in the development of large missiles, with a capacity for strategic nuclear contact, the United States may have a substantial lead in developing small but sophisticated nuclear weapons for tactical use. With this in mind, United States military authorities would be very reluctant to have these weapons included in any early measures of disarmament which would involve declarations, and possibly limitation and sequestration. Negotiations about these measures, if developed in detail, could have an intelligence value for the Soviet Union.

(b) The strategy of the nuclear deterrent, from the Western side, presumes that the Soviet Union, being the potential aggressor, would make the "first strike." The Western powers must therefore have their nuclear armaments so disposed as to be able to make the retaliatory, or "second strike." The strategic advantage in this situation lies with the Soviet Union and the Western nuclear armament must consequently be on a large scale if it is to be capable of making the "second strike." This capability is obviously necessary if the Western nuclear armament is to serve as a deterrent at all.

Considerations like these must be given a great weight and the Western nuclear powers are the best qualified to judge them. There are, however, solid political reasons for making the Western position on disarmament as strong as possible, both as a basis for serious negotiation and as a means of allaying public anxiety about unrestricted development of armaments. To present a pale reflection of the Khrushchev proposals would not meet either of these requirements and this is what the Western five should seek earnestly to avoid. General Burns and his colleagues have admittedly made considerable progress over the past weeks but it seems now that they must try to find some formula for filling the gap as regards nuclear disarmament.

A good start might be to delete the word "conventional" from paragraphs E and F of Stage I (page 1). This would mean that the proposed measures in this Stage relating to armaments and force levels could include tactical nuclear weapons. Moreover, if the items dealing with surprise attack (E in Stage I, I in Stage II) were to include a reference to missiles, it could be justifiably held that the Western proposals did seek with some urgency to deal with the most pressing questions in the field of disarmament. The effect of these changes, from the United States point of view, would at the time of implementation involve disclosure of sophisticated nuclear weapons in the tactical category, but at the same time measures under consideration to safeguard against surprise attack would involve the Soviet nuclear capability with long-range missiles. It has yet to be demonstrated that negotiations about measures of that kind would produce a weakening of the deterrent on the Western side.

There can be no doubt that changes in this relatively straightforward sense, if accepted by all the Western powers, would add greatly to the Western statement of position. It would then embrace the possibility of concrete nuclear disarmament in relatively early stages of the programme. As they stand, the Soviet proposals leave all nuclear disarmament to the last stage.

With the foregoing in mind, a telegram of instruction to General Burns† has been drafted for your approval and signature. He is instructed to adopt the following positions:

(a) To inform his negotiating partners that the Western paper is not satisfactory to Canada because sufficient priority has not been given to measures involving nuclear armaments and their means of delivery. The items contained in the first two stages and dealing with the prior notification of missile launchings are considered insufficient. While the Canadian authorities are acutely conscious of security considerations, they believe that the Western negotiating position would be strengthened if some items involving nuclear disarmament were included in the first two stages. In this respect, the Canadian position is not unlike that of France.

(b) To press for the deletion of the word "conventional" from paragraphs E and F of Stage I and for the inclusion of a suitable reference to long-range missiles in the items dealing with surprise attack. These changes would be calculated to strengthen the statement of the Western position, although they might not satisfy completely the requirements of France.

(c) If those changes were made, to associate Canada with the amended paper as a statement of an initial Western negotiating position and to support it in the discussions in NATO and in the ten power negotiations, while continuing with his colleagues to achieve additional improvements.

(d) If the changes cannot be agreed in the time available to consider with his colleagues what is the best line to take in the absence of a single agreed Western position. This might involve the presentation of a joint United Kingdom-United States paper which the other Western negotiating powers, including Canada, would support as far as possible. Alternatively, the Western five might prefer to negotiate initially on the basis of the Khrushchev proposals rather than to table counter proposals on which they cannot agree.[59]

La première Session du Comité des dix pays s'est tenue du 15 mars au 29 avril.

For the final version of the Western proposals, see United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmnd. 981, Text of the plan for comprehensive disarmament tabled by the delegations of Canada, France, Italy, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America at the Conference of the Ten Nations Committee on Disarmament in Geneva on March 16, 1960, together with an Extract from a Speech by the Foreign Secretary at the United Nations on September 17, 1959 (London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1960). The first session of the Ten Nation Committee was held from March 15 to April 29.

FOREIGN MINISTERS MEETING — DISARMAMENT[60]

The basis for discussion at the Foreign Ministers Meeting on Disarmament on April 13 was the proposition, expressed with different degrees of emphasis by all the ministers, that the ten nation negotiations had arrived at a pause amounting virtually to a deadlock, and that some features needed to be taken, both in the Ten Power Committee and at the Summit to regain the momentum of the negotiations and come to grips with specific issues.

2. The Minister laid strong emphasis on the need to take immediate steps to prevent the deadlock in the negotiations from becoming complete. He expressed concern over press accounts of the nature of the negotiations so far which by now had gained wide public currency. These had created the impression that all the negotiators in Geneva were accomplishing was the mutual rejection of each others' plans. This was an entirely unsatisfactory public posture, bearing in mind the responsibility of the governments represented on the Ten Power Committee towards all nations outside the Committee to develop patterns for disarmament capable of application to the Ten initially, and extension beyond the Ten ultimately.

3. There was general agreement in the meeting with these views but some difference of opinion as to the methods by which the present situation might best be improved. The Minister pointed out that one of the less satisfactory elements in the Western position as it had been developed had been its failure to lay sufficient emphasis on the ultimate responsibilities of UN under the Charter for Disarmament, which he suggested may have presented the Soviet side with propaganda opportunities. The Minister referred also to what he feared to be a growing misunderstanding of the Western position on the relationship between the International Disarmament Organization and UN. The Western proposals had been developed in such a way as now to be capable of bearing the interpretation that the Western side was working to set up the International Disarmament Organization entirely outside UN. In these circumstances, the Minister suggested to his colleagues that it might be useful if the Secretary-General were to be encouraged to meet at an early date with the Ten Power Committee with a view to explaining his views on the relationship between disarmament and UN in a way which would preserve the principle of the ultimate responsibility of UN under the Charter. He thought that such an invitation might be extended by the Ten before the April 29 recess.

4. Support for the importance of preserving in principle the position of UN was forthcoming from Mr. Herter and Mr. Lloyd particularly. Mr. Herter said that USA authorities had this point very much in mind, and would within the course of the next week produce a paper for distribution within the Western Five on the question of the relationship between disarmament and UN. Mr. Segni, although less explicitly than either Mr. Herter or Mr. Lloyd, also accepted the Minister's emphasis in principle. Significantly enough, only Mr. Couve de Murville failed to react at all to the suggestion that an invitation to the Secretary-General might be issued.

5. Nevertheless it seemed to be the consensus of the other ministers that, in the present circumstances, an invitation by the Secretary-General in Geneva was unlikely to be helpful at this time.

6. However, all the ministers considered it desirable to counter Zorin's statement by a statement of Western principles. The texts of UK and USA drafts of such a statement (which

7. At the same time, the ministers agreed that their representatives should attempt to define areas of possible progress in the negotiations on the basis of a comparison of the Western and Soviet plans. The Minister gave particular emphasis to the importance we attach to this exercise. The list of such areas of possible progress would be referred to ministers for consideration at Istanbul. It was also agreed on Mr. Segni's suggestion that the five ministers would consider at Istanbul whether any further pre-summit consultations of the five should be held to prepare final advice for use at the Summit.

DISARMAMENT: NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING

The Minister looks forward not only to hearing an up to date report from you before the five Western ministers meet privately in Istanbul at five p.m. May 1, but also to having you available as an advisor during the NATO Ministerial Meeting there. Disarmament in relation to the Summit will be the first, and one of the most important, items on the agenda of the NATO Meeting.

2. The Minister will arrive in London at nine a.m. April 29 and will leave from there for Istanbul at noon on the following day April 30. Since it seems desirable for you to accompany him from London, a seat will be reserved for you on his plane. I trust this will meet your convenience.

3. You will of course be a member of the Canadian Delegation. We think it undesirable that you should appear in any way as a representative of your Western negotiating colleagues.

4. You will wish to keep Canada House London and the Department informed what arrangements you are able to make either to join the Minister's plane in London or proceed independently to Istanbul.

DISARMAMENT: REPORT FOR THE FIVE FOREIGN MINISTERS

After numerous drafts and discussions lasting until almost midnight last night, the five delegates failed to reach agreement on suggestions for Western tactics at the Summit. The text which was eventually accepted by all but the French is given below. Full text of the report will be sent to you and NATO by bag and will be available in Istanbul through American channels.

2. Moch's objections appeared to derive from the French emphasis on early action on the means of delivery of nuclear weapons and on nuclear disarmament. He therefore was unwilling to accept either the suggestion in paragraph 3 for the objective on which agreement might be sought with Khrushchev or the proposal in the final paragraph that the Committee should address itself to "early stage" specific measures.

3. It was understood that the four endorsing the tactics would also present recommendations to their ministers. Text of the relevant section in General Burns' memorandum to the Minister is given in our following telegram.

4. Text Begins: "20. Suggestions for Western Tactics at the Summit. The most promising tactic for the Western Powers to take at the Summit Meeting would appear to be the following: The Western Powers having tabled their proposal relating to the principles of general and complete disarmament and the conditions for the implementation of these principles, the first course might be to try to get Khrushchev to agree to these Western proposals on principles without attempting to compromise with Soviet statements of general principles.

If this is unsuccessful, the Heads of Government might then state that although both sides accept and support Resolution 1378 of the UN on general and complete disarmament, it is apparent from the discussions that have taken place that agreement on a definition of the term "general and complete disarmament" cannot repeat not be reached. Therefore, they might attempt to reach agreement on an ultimate objective such as is set forth in paragraph A. of the preamble or paragraph III.A. of the Western Plan.

Whether or not repeat not agreement can be reached on such an objective or on acceptable principles, the four Heads of Government should direct their representatives on the Committee to address themselves to negotiations on early stage specific measures. Text Ends.

DISARMAMENT: REPORT FOR THE FIVE FOREIGN MINISTERS

"Difficulties in the Western Position:

When considering possible Western tactics both at the Summit and in future negotiations in the Ten-Nation Committee, it should not repeat not be ignored that at the present moment the West's negotiating position is not repeat not flexible due to a number of unresolved internal Western problems which must be solved in order to enable the West to adopt substantive positions and negotiate them with flexibility are the following:

(a) The Western nuclear powers must reach agreement among themselves on the rate at which they are prepared to transfer fissionable materials from weapons to non-military purposes. Further work is also required on the verification measures we would regard as necessary to control this process.

(b) In order to meet Soviet objections the West must resolve the problem of the relationship between disarmament measures affecting missiles and those affecting other means of delivering nuclear weapons such as aircraft and submarines. This involves the problem of "foreign bases." The first steps toward disarmament may lie in development of proposals for safeguards against surprise attack.

(c) At the present time difficulties within the Western camp place an obstacle to the negotiation of specific force levels. France claims that while the Algerian war persists she cannot repeat not reduce to the 750,000 level. The level of 2.1 million to which the USA will negotiate is rejected by the Eastern side.

(d) Further expert work is required among the Western negotiating partners to enable us to explain in detail to the other side the provisions in the Western plan for the reduction of armaments and the relation of those reductions to specific force levels.

Western Objectives at the Summit:

2. The following suggests the course of action open to the Western Powers at the Summit Meeting that would appear to have the best chance for opening the way for tangible progress in the Ten-Nation Committee.

3. The Western Powers should attempt to obtain the Soviet Union's agreement that the points of difference between the two statements of "principles" submitted in the Committee are not repeat not so great as to constitute an obstacle to detailed discussion of those first measures of disarmament appearing in the initial stages of the Western and Soviet plans. If at the Summit both sides could agree that their conceptions of the final goal were not repeat not fundamentally at variance, the Western Powers could then seek to obtain a Summit instruction to the Conference to abandon sterile argument on the ultimate stage of the disarmament programme and to begin negotiations on specific first stage measures.

4. The Soviet Union's first response to Western efforts in this direction at the Summit may be to demand a more formal agreement on principles as a prior condition to its agreement to start negotiating first measures in the Ten-Nation Committee. Such a proposal should be rejected, as there would certainly be no repeat no time at the Summit Conference to draw up and reach agreement on such a set of principles. And if the problem were referred back to the Ten-Nation Committee, we should find ourselves committed for a further indefinite period to the same sort of unproductive discussion we have been carrying on for the past seven weeks.

5. Alternatively the Soviet Union might insist that if measures were discussed without prior agreement on principles, then the former must include the "partial measures" suggested in Khrushchev's speech of September 18 in the UN as a second Soviet line in case the Western Powers were unwilling to embark on general and complete disarmament. (It will be recalled that this list of partial measures includes items such as the establishment of an atom free zone in Europe, the abolition of military bases and the conclusion of a non-aggression pact between NATO members and members of the Warsaw Treaty.)

6. If the Western Powers should be successful in obtaining the Soviet Union's agreement to begin discussions in the Conference of first measures, the following would be the specific measures which offer the most promising areas for some constructive progress in the Committee, taking into account the present positions of the two sides:

(a) reduction in force levels and conventional armaments;

(b) safeguards against surprise attack;

(c) cessation of the production of fissionable materials for weapons uses and the conversion of existing stocks to peaceful uses;

(d) the international control mechanism required to verify implementation of the three foregoing measures.

7. Whatever the final result of discussions on disarmament at the Summit may be, it will be important that the Western Powers emerge in the public eye as firm supporters of general and complete disarmament and do not repeat not allow the Soviet Union to present itself as the only custodian of that ideal. Text Ends.

Memorandum by Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [n.p.], May 1, 1960

MEETING OF WESTERN FIVE ON DISARMAMENT

On my journey to Istanbul, I have been hearing from General Burns about the situation in the Ten-Nation Committee at the time of its adjournment. It seems that the two sides were in such a state of disagreement that they could not even agree on a joint communiqué. The press has called attention to this "disarray" which applies, I gather, not only to the Committee as a whole but within the Western team as well. I have no doubt that we are facing a serious situation and that this is a common problem which we should discuss frankly and thoroughly. I say this at the outset because my remarks are intended not as a criticism of the past but as an attempt to meet the present situation squarely and to suggest means of improving it.

I am sure we can all agree that the results so far in the Ten-Nation Committee are neither impressive nor promising. We had to expect that there would be a tendency to mark time in the period before the Summit Conference and there were at the same time developments in the tripartite negotiations on nuclear testing which might have a delaying influence on the Ten-Power talks. Moreover, the Committee has been engaged only in the opening phase of a very complex and difficult discussion.

Nevertheless, what has happened to date is pretty unsatisfactory. It is clear from the presentation in the opposing plans that there is a fundamental difference in approach to the problem. In two months of negotiation our efforts to lessen these differences have not succeeded.

Assessment of the Negotiations to Date

Each side has argued at length that its own proposals provide the basis for negotiations. Those of the other side have been criticized as an unsatisfactory basis. This is a familiar pattern in East-West negotiations but not one which the Canadian Government would like to see pursued indefinitely.

As a result of the Washington meeting of Ministers in April, the Western negotiators in Geneva were encouraged to seek, in the period before the Summit meeting, to uncover areas of possible agreement between the two sides. The current report of the Five shows how little has been accomplished in that direction and only serves to underline that the positions set by governments were such that an agreement on a plan of work could not be reached.

As a matter of tactics, we have been obliged in the Ten-Nation Committee to speak confidently about our position but, if at this point the Western powers were to go before the United Nations General Assembly, would it be sufficient to argue that the Soviet Union had been intransigent? I suggest that the judgment of the uncommitted nations and of large sections of our own public opinion would almost certainly be that neither side had a monopoly on intransigence.

And surely we must look at the Western position through the eyes of the uncommitted nations, who do not fully share all our suspicions about Soviet intentions. They might find our performance at Geneva one of hesitation and hedging. They would probably see nothing wrong with the sweeping Soviet professions about the ultimate goals of general and complete disarmament within a fixed period. To them the West might appear to have been evading a commitment on ultimate aims and, instead, to be pressing prematurely for a discussion of individual measures having a sharp emphasis on control. To the uncommitted we might appear to be avoiding deliberately the basic issues.

I have no illusions about the difficulties of trying to set a timetable for any comprehensive programme of disarmament. I think that the Western position in this regard has been straightforward and has been presented clearly. I am not convinced, however, that we could not have shown more willingness to seek a mutually acceptable set of principles. As in the past, it might not have proved possible to find common language and almost certainly we would have risked divergence of interpretation. But I believe we could have done more to demonstrate our interest in finding common ground. Even if we had failed in this endeavour, we might have succeeded in the process of persuading the other side to move from generalities to specific measures.

I am glad that the Western side in Geneva has begun to describe the ultimate goal as "general and complete disarmament." I have felt, ever since the unanimous adoption of the United Nations resolution, that it was unwise for any of us to resist that description. To offset the propaganda advantage which the Soviet side have undeservedly had on this score, we should all seek opportunities to emphasize that the Western goal is the one stated in the United Nations resolution. Incidentally when the time comes to discuss information policy in NATO, the Council should take steps to delete "general and complete disarmament" from the list of items in the NATO document entitled "Countering Soviet Propaganda Themes."

I am fully aware that we must accept and be patient about the frequent periods of deadlock which will occur in these negotiations. This has been typical of recent negotiations with the Soviet Union. But surely this does not absolve the West from exploring every reasonable means for shortening the periods of impasse and delay. Such an opportunity seemed to have been presented when the Soviet representative tabled his "declaration of principles."

If there was any new element in this exchange it was the Soviet suggestion for a "pledge" not to be the first to use nuclear weapons. This proposal, which may evoke considerable public support, was rejected by the West flatly and rather too quickly. I do not say that the "pledge," as presented, did open the door for progress; I say only that it should not have been rejected without exploring it.

I have laboured this assessment of our conduct of the negotiations for two reasons. First, because I see in the performance to date too many propaganda advantages which have accrued to the Soviet side largely by default. For example some people might think we gave Mr. Zorin a wholly undeserved opportunity to pose as the champion of the United Nations. My second reason is much more important: I am convinced that no progress will be achieved in the Committee unless there is a more forthright effort to get the negotiations moving.

Suggestions for Reactivating the Ten-Power Talks

As I see it the report of the Five offers little in the way of recommendation or of hope for a solution to the present impasse in the Committee. In any event, the scene has now shifted to the Summit. A simple presentation by the Western Heads of Government of the list of measures in the Western plan will not suffice. With Mr. Khrushchev they will be required to look to the positions of both sides. As a minimum there must be a sufficient demonstration to world public opinion that the Western leaders are serious in their search for a formula to stimulate and guide the Geneva negotiations.

To date, the Soviet side has offered little more than generalized measures, described as principles. There are difficulties in seeking an agreed statement of principles, and perhaps no real advantage in covering up serious differences with vague phrases. However, the announced Soviet position is not one which Mr. Khrushchev would abandon lightly at the Summit. Indeed we can expect him to press strongly his proposals in whole or in part. However, if our underlying assumptions about the Soviet desire for continuing the détente have validity, Mr. Khrushchev might be prepared to settle for a joint announcement that the real difference between the two sides, as regards "principles," is not so great as to prevent detailed discussion of the measures of disarmament in the early stages of the Western and Soviet plans. The announcement would constitute a directive from the Summit to the Ten-Nation Committee to break off the argument about principles and ultimate goals and to begin negotiations on specific first stage measures. Conceivably, at the Summit Mr. Khrushchev might press for the drafting of an agreed set of principles. A Western response along the lines suggested would be much better than a flat rejection. This may be one way, I suggest, of reactivating the Ten-Power talks.

Another way might be to try to link individual measures from the Western plan with Russian proposals of comparable significance to them. As an illustration, the West might offer to negotiate on controlled limitation of force levels below 2.1 million and related conventional armaments if the Soviet side would agree to negotiate on the nuclear disarmament measures in stages I and II of the Western plan. Each such package would have to be examined very carefully but I believe that it is worth considering this kind of approach. It might well begin a process of balanced concessions.

My third suggestion is that early in the resumed sessions of the Ten-Nation Committee the Western side should propose that as appropriate the Committee should go into private and informal meetings, which would be attended by a limited number from each delegation, in which the Secretariat would not participate, and of which no records would be kept. The emphasis would be on full secrecy. In the past, meetings of this kind have proved successful for making progress in the formal sessions which would of course continue. Instead of having this proposal made in the Committee, the Western Heads of Government might seek to have an agreed directive from the Summit. This would be a more effective way of accomplishing the same end.

I have one further suggestion, which has to do with strengthening our position for the future. During the Committee proceeding to date the Western side have been pressing for the negotiation of concrete measures and especially those in the first two stages of the Western plan. We should assume, I think, that at some stage the Soviet side will come around to this point of view. The time for detailed negotiations may be nearer than we think but in any event we cannot afford to be caught unprepared. It is of the utmost importance that at the moment when the Soviet side responds in this sense, we should be fully prepared to negotiate the measures which we have said are ripe for negotiation.

My impression is that much study remains to be done before the Western negotiators would be in a position to enter into detailed discussions and to retain the initiative in them. This means that the Western delegations in Geneva should take full advantage of the recess and they should be strengthened by the addition of military and other experts as required. I believe too that NATO military planners, through the Council, can greatly assist in this preparatory work for many of these disarmament measures are very directly related to our defence positions and policies. I had this in mind last December when I advocated the development of an intimate relationship between NATO and our disarmament advisers in Geneva.[62] The suggestion has, if anything, gained validity in the course of the intervening months.

Because in the Ten-Nation Committee we are faced with an unsatisfactory situation, and because the Summit Conference will have an important bearing on it, I considered it worth while to speak quite frankly in this group about our common difficulties. For the same reasons, and because disarmament is of equal concern to all members of NATO, in the course of my remarks in the NATO Council tomorrow I intend to speak along the lines of the four suggestions I have made today.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa, n.d.]

SUGGESTIONS FOR REACTIVATING THE NEGOTIATIONS IN THE TEN NATION COMMITTEE MADE BY THE CANADIAN SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AT THE PRELIMINARY MEETING OF THE FIVE WESTERN MINISTERS, ISTANBUL, MAY 1, 1960

(a) At the Summit Mr. Khrushchev might insist on looking beyond the measures proposed by the West. He could be expected to press for the adoption of the "principles," which were contained in his plan for general and complete disarmament and which had been advanced persistently by the Soviet side in Geneva. It might prove difficult to reach agreement on principles at the Summit but as a minimum there must be a sufficient demonstration to world public opinion that the Western leaders were serious in their search for a formula to stimulate and guide the Geneva negotiations. If agreement could not be reached on principles, Mr. Khrushchev might be prepared to settle for a joint announcement that the difficulties between the two sides on principles were not great enough to prevent detailed discussions on specific measures. It would be better than a flat rejection for the West to propose an announcement along these lines, which would constitute a recommendation from the Summit to the Ten to break off the argument about principles and ultimate goals and to begin negotiations on specific measures.

(b) As appropriate, the Ten Nation Committee should go into private and informal meetings, which would be attended by a limited number from each delegation, in which the Secretariat would not participate and of which no record would be kept.

(c) An effort should be made to link individual measures from the Western plan with proposals from the Soviet side of comparable significance to them. This package approach could be a means of beginning a process of balanced concessions.

(d) Within the Western team, vigorous efforts should be made to complete preparations for negotiations on specific measures. The Canadian impression was that Western preparations were by no means complete and it was important not to be caught unprepared, if and when the Soviet Union agreed to turn to specific measures. Moreover, NATO military planners, through the Council, could greatly assist in this preparatory work, for many of the disarmament measures were directly related to Western defence positions and policies.

NEW SOVIET DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS

I have not repeat not yet had an opportunity to study the Soviet proposals.[63] This telegram is intended to give you my preliminary reaction and should be read in conjunction with reference telegram containing the text of my statement in the House on June 3. These telegrams will serve as additional guidance for you in your preparatory discussions in Geneva.

2. In the introductory section of the new Soviet document reference is made to the fact that several states in particular France have expressed the view that the disarmament process should begin with the abolition of the means of delivery of weapons of mass destruction. This cuts to the heart of the difference between USA and France which was so clearly revealed at the meeting of the Five foreign ministers in Istanbul. Herter then emphasized that the French position on this measure raised a maze of uncomfortable problems and that it was dangerous to Western security to bring forward to the first stage an item which properly belonged in the last. He spoke about the multiplicity of weapons, many of which were standard equipment for USA forces which could be classed as "means of delivery." Like nuclear war heads themselves, many of these means of delivery could be very easily concealed. The French proposal, if pursued, could create for the Western Five a serious division on a most important policy matter. In reply Couve de Murville spoke of the need for a balance of nuclear and conventional components in any properly phased disarmament programme and he made no repeat no effort to give precision to the French proposal concerning means of delivery. At Istanbul the UK and French delegations seemed confident that the USSR would reject anything like the French proposal in any event.

3. The difference between USA and France in this regard has been no repeat no secret. The new Soviet proposal shows how thoroughly the Soviet authorities understand and appreciate the difference. This is only one part but a very important part of the difficulty for the West in the revised Soviet plan.

4. The fanfare with which these Soviet proposals have been launched, including the calling in of all ambassadors in Moscow, suggests that a major propaganda offensive may be in the making designed to knock the Western side off balance when the 10-Nation Committee resumes. There are other possibilities as well: the public campaign could be a prelude to a new Soviet effort (a) to discredit the West thoroughly in the 10-Nation Committee; (b) perhaps to discredit the Committee as it is now composed, in other words to seek a change in its composition; or (c) to resume discussion in the Committee but with a view to switching quickly to the UN, presumably to the Disarmament Commission. In any event, this latest move is no repeat no doubt intended to strengthen the Soviet hand at the 15th Session of the General Assembly. The Soviet delegation to the 14th Session made no repeat no secret of its elation at the results from Khrushchev's disarmament initiative last year which paid off handsomely not repeat not only in the Assembly disarmament discussions but in all debates in which the USSR had a major interest.

5. Notwithstanding these extraneous purposes, we believe that the Western reaction to the new proposals should be to continue to press for serious negotiations in the 10-Nation Committee. Given the alternatives of a propaganda debate or serious negotiation, you should be in no repeat no doubt about the Canadian preference for serious negotiation. You should therefore continue to be guided by Telegram V-329 June 1,† in discussing in the Five the tactics for meeting the new Soviet move.

6. I have seen no repeat no suggestion yet as to how the Western Five should reply to the Khrushchev letter.[64] A detailed reply could hardly be prepared before June 7 when the 10-Nation Committee reconvenes. It think it may be desirable to have replied to Khrushchev before the talks resume. In the circumstances it may be advisable to send a brief reply from each of the Five but in similar terms, that is: acknowledging that the complex new Soviet proposals require careful study; welcoming the Soviet intention to present and explain the revised plan in the 10-Nation Committee; and emphasizing that the detailed reaction of the Western Powers will be given in the Committee after appropriate study and consultation. A reply along these lines could be made before the resumption of the Committee. I should be glad to have the reaction in Paris, Washington, London, and Rome on this suggestion and also the comments of the other missions to whom this telegram has been addressed.

7. For Washington: I shall be glad to know whether the Prime Minister agrees that a short reply along the lines suggested in the previous paragraph would be appropriate and satisfactory in the circumstances. In any event it would not repeat not preclude a more detailed reply later on if this were considered desirable.

The new Soviet proposals seem certain to have strong political and propaganda appeal to the vast majority of the world's people. Moreover, they have at least the appearance of moving in several respects towards the Western position. On the basis of preliminary study, I propose taking the following line on Monday afternoon with my colleagues if you agree.

2. The proposals suggest that there may be a greater possibility of useful negotiation to be the case. It is therefore more necessary than ever to be prepared for serious negotiations. We must explore possible advances towards the Western position without overlooking the unacceptable features of the original plan for general and complete disarmament which seem to remain in the new proposals.

3. The proposal for abolition of the nuclear deterrent in the first stage will require the most careful consultation within the NATO Alliance. Our first task when the meetings resume will be to clarify these provisions in particular and to make it clear to the USSR that governmental consideration of their new and far-reaching proposal is essential. After a period for clarifications and questions and provided that the Soviet representative has indicated a serious approach, we might find it desirable to propose a brief recess for intensive Western consultations in NATO.

4. We should scrutinize the Soviet proposals carefully in order to determine which of the apparent moves towards the Western position may have a genuine basis. The elucidation of this question should be one of the objects of enquiries addressed to the USSR.

5. Also to be clarified are matters which may continue to constitute impediments to agreement. Among these there may be the continuing proposal that the entire process of general and complete disarmament should be executed within a fixed period of time and that a single treaty should embody all measures for the whole process. It is to be hoped that the USSR will not repeat not insist upon this position which is particularly unrealistic.

6. In order to be able to discuss the Soviet proposals and to advocate the Western plan in this new context it is imperative that the papers concerning the provisions of the Western plan be completed as a matter of urgency (see my telegram 678 June 3† for a report on the status of these papers).

7. Among the difficulties I see in the new proposals is the provision that the liquidation of bases should take place at the outset. Although overseas bases for aircraft and missiles might be eliminated with the means of delivery, the concurrent elimination of bases for conventional forces would substantially weaken the Western Alliance. There are certain other early provisions such as the prohibition of naval vessels proceeding beyond territorial waters which would be difficult to accept.

8. On the other hand, the provisions regarding control appear on the whole to be more reasonable than before but detailed scrutiny will be essential. In particular, the question of the meaning of the provision for access to former armaments manufacturing plants to verify that they do not repeat not resume production will have to be clarified.

9. The new provisions for peace-keeping machinery in the final stage of disarmament appears at least to have conceded the point that such arrangements are necessary and this may serve to eliminate one of the important differences between the two sides.

10. In the light of the foregoing, the initial Western statements should be serious and at least at the outset non-controversial, indicating a desire to proceed notwithstanding the absence of direction from the Summit, receiving the Soviet proposals as a contribution to the negotiations, emphasizing the need for study of the proposals and seeking clarifications on particular points.

11. My only comment on the substance of your proposed reply to Khrushchev's letter is that it might be desirable to emphasize the need for careful inter-governmental consideration of the new proposals on the Western side. On the procedural aspects, I would observe that the effective coordination of the replies from the Western Five seems more important than their delivery before the talks resume.

DISARMAMENT: SOVIET PROPOSALS

Your telegram underscores two of the most important questions on which the Western Five are required to formulate a clear stand: (a) the elimination of all means of delivering nuclear weapons and (b) the restriction of the membership in the nuclear club. They are, of course, two among the many measures which comprise the field of nuclear disarmament. This in turn will have to be an essential element in any balanced programme of general and complete disarmament.

2. As you point out, both these specific questions have far-reaching implications for Canada and special significance for our NATO partners whose territory lies close to areas where overwhelming conventional forces can be quickly massed by the Warsaw treaty countries. All of these implications deserve, and are receiving, the most careful study here. I assume the same will be true in the discussions among the Western Five and any consultations in NATO on the subject.

3. Any position Canada adopts must be fully consistent with our announced view that nuclear disarmament in all of its aspects, in particular as regards long range delivery systems, should be given priority but, of course, in the context of a balanced (specially as between nuclear and conventional measures) and controlled programme of disarmament. As we have already indicated, we shall weigh carefully whatever the French may be able to contribute to the consideration of this matter by way of precision and clarification of their own concepts. The rather loosely contrived French paper (your telegram 691 June 8)† suggests that their ideas are far removed from those in the latest Soviet proposal.

4. It follows that in the coming period it will be imperative within the Western Five to get from the French a clear statement of their position, and in the Ten Nation Committee to learn all we can about the Soviet proposals and Soviet intentions with regard to them. As I have repeatedly observed, Canada's purpose in Geneva is to explore every avenue of possible agreement on any helpful disarmament measure.

5. In the light of this and the emphasis I have consistently given to Canada's interest in serious negotiations, you should not repeat not consider yourself inhibited by the fact that Canada is not repeat not a nuclear power. This should in no repeat no way cause you to hesitate to participate fully in this very important phase of the negotiation. I look to you to exercise every reasonable influence you can, in the Committee and in the consultations of the five, to probe for the solid substance of what the USSR and the Western powers are prepared to accept in the field of nuclear disarmament and especially as regards long range delivery systems and the spread of nuclear weapons. In this process of probing and prodding your role need not repeat not be curtailed because of any of the considerations which you have raised.

6. We are giving most careful consideration to the implications which these nuclear proposals have for our defence and disarmament policies I am most anxious that the current period of searching enquiry will enable us to weigh these implications in the light of the real positions of the other participants concerned in the negotiation. It is my hope that this will make it possible for us to determine the most constructive direction for exerting Canadian pressure in the interest of making progress towards disarmament.

DISARMAMENT: SOVIET PROPOSALS OF JUNE 2

On June 7 the Soviet Union opened the resumed meetings of the Ten Nation Committee by introducing a new set of proposals dated June 2 (Annex "A").† These had been delivered to the Ambassadors of the Western Five in Moscow, but also to all diplomatic representatives accredited there, and were released the next day by Mr. Khrushchev at a press conference.

2. In the new Soviet proposals there are sufficient concessions to the Western point of view, and in particular to Canada's stand, to make it unwise to reject the proposals out of hand. Some of the reasons for saying this are:

(a) There has been an apparent effort to include measures, although in Soviet terms, like those advanced by the West in the Committee prior to the Summit recess. The Western powers would not wish to incur, as they did in 1955, the accusation that they were backing away from their own proposals.[65]

(b) Whereas the Western powers could convincingly argue that the Khrushchev plan of last September contained nothing but generalities, the new plan contains practical details of considerable importance. In particular, it puts forward elaborate suggestions for establishing control of disarmament. Moreover, it acknowledges the need for some international machinery to maintain security and to prevent rearmament after the programme of disarmament has been completed. It moves some way in the direction of an international police force, another feature stressed by Canada.

(c) The new proposals are said to be based on principles of balance and staging. The claim is that their implementation would give no state a military advantage over others. These principles, together with that of control, are considered essential by the Western powers.

(d) The Western plan of March 16 emphasizes the need for international study as a preparation for agreement on disarmament measures. The new Soviet proposals admit this to some extent.

3. Accordingly, it seems most desirable not to dismiss the new proposals as mere propaganda but, on the possibility that the new Soviet plan could contain negotiate elements, to seek clarification of the various measures and to get at those which were intended to be taken seriously. This has been the immediate reaction by the West and it has been followed by a period of questioning in the Committee in the course of which the Western side have re-stated some of the principles of disarmament, embodied in the Western plan, which they considered essential. This period of questioning was also intended to give the Western powers time to assess the new Soviet proposals thoroughly, to re-assess Western positions and to concert the reaction of the Western Five in the Committee on various questions of substance raised in the new proposals.

SUGGESTED CANADIAN REACTION

I. PACKAGE PROPOSAL

4. In concert with other Western negotiating countries, Canada should now react with specific proposals for packaging:

(a) proposals from each side that should be related to preserve balance and

(b) proposals from each side that disclose a fundamental similarity of view despite superficial differences in detail.

An example of (a) would be measures in the nuclear field linked with the measures in the field of conventional arms and force levels along the lines detailed below in III and IV. Two examples of (b) would be proposals for disarmament in outer space and for peacekeeping machinery. In essence, the approach would be the offer of concrete suggestions for balanced concessions in the interests of early agreement on partial measures and of the adoption of a practical method for negotiating first on areas which should occasion the least delay before implementation. Gen. Burns has already been instructed to advance this approach in the Committee.

II. SINGLE TREATY CONCEPT

5. The desirability of the partial measures approach, although clear to Canada, has so far been opposed by the Soviet side which has insisted that the Conference should attempt to draft one comprehensive treaty. Despite its obvious drawbacks, the one treaty concept might have broad appeal in the United Nations in the light of Soviet advances to meet the Western position. Accordingly, in the interests of moving to effective negotiations, the Canadian reaction should not close the door to the possibility of eventual acceptance of the one treaty approach would be offered as a concession. However, it would be made clear that the treaty envisaged would include:

(a) measures packaged in a balanced fashion in three successive stages,

(b) all essential details of control relevant to the various measures in each stage,

(c) unambiguous provisions to relate the transition from one stage to another to the satisfactory implementation of the earlier stage.

It would also be understood that the two sides would at once settle down to joint study of the provisions to be included in the first stage on the basis of linking balanced concessions on proposals made by both sides in such a way as to ensure that no military advantage would accrue to either at any stage. In addition, to focus attention on disarmament measures as opposed to political questions, the method and timing of the adherence of countries not party to the negotiations would be left in abeyance pending the development of a draft text.

III. NUCLEAR DISARMAMENT

6. As presented the first stage Soviet proposals are unacceptable. They ignore the principle of balance and would place the West at a serious military disadvantage. Nevertheless the West should agree to a first stage "package" containing measures in both the nuclear field and the field of force levels and conventional arms. The details of an acceptable package would, of course, be subject to negotiation.

7. In principle and subject to the creation and effective functioning of an adequate control system, Canada could agree on the following.

Stage I to include provisions for

(a) cessation of production of fissile materials for weapons purposes;

(b) prohibition against placing in orbit or stationing in outer space of any vehicles carrying weapons of mass destruction;

(c) prior notification to a control organ of all proposed missile or rocket firings;

(d) inspection teams at all launching pads, airfields and harbours of submarines carrying nuclear weapons.

Stage II to include provisions for

(a) conversion to peaceful uses of all stockpiles of fissile material;

(b) complete prohibition on all nuclear weapons, coupled with destruction of all strategic carriers, including submarines equipped to fire nuclear weapons;

(c) a "declaration" voluntarily prohibiting the development, manufacture, stockpiling or use of weapons intended for chemical or bacteriological warfare.

These modifications in the Western plan shift measures of nuclear disarmament forward from the second and last stages to the first and second stages. One effect is to do away with the original Western proposal for a first stage devoted almost entirely to joint studies. However, the process of joint study, an indispensable preliminary to intelligently conceived agreement, is retained in the single treaty approach.

IV. FORCE LEVELS AND CONVENTIONAL ARMS

8. If, as suggested above, the earlier stages of a disarmament programme are to include substantial measures in the nuclear field, it is imperative to protect the principle of balance by introducing compensating measures to reduce the Soviet strength in the field of conventional arms. The Soviet proposals envisage no conventional measures in the first stage but provide for a USA-USSR force level ceiling of 1.7 million in the second stage linked with the destruction of arms rendered surplus by the limitation on military manpower. A series of detailed proposals in the Western plan contemplated a USA-USSR ceiling in the first stage of 2.5 million, reducing in the second stage to 2.1 The Western figures were, of course, in the context of a programme which foresaw the destruction of delivery systems occurring only in the last stage. Both sides conceive of comparable ceilings for other states. The Soviet emphasis is on the destruction of conventional arms surplus to force level requirements, while the West has been thinking in terms of sequestration of surplus arms in the first stages.

9. The Canadian position should be based on the need (a) for the early agreement on controlled force level ceilings on all NATO and Warsaw Pact countries and China, and (b) for the fixing of the limitation at as low a figure at each stage as is consistent with the principle of balance between total Eastern and total Western forces rather than between the USSR and United States. In particular Canada should aim at a USA-USSR ceiling in the first stage of not more than 2.3 million (roughly the existing level) followed by a reduction in the second stage to no more than 1.9 million. In each stage appropriate levels would be set for the other countries concerned, so as to maintain an East-West balance of forces. Surplus conventional arms, including nuclear weapons, many of which are now in essence conventional, would be destroyed in each stage.

V. CONTROL

10. The new Soviet proposals are much more detailed on the vital subject of control than the earlier Soviet proposals. However, the Soviet delegation is probably close to the limit of its willingness to discuss control as a sort of theoretical and general exercise apart from specific measures of disarmament.

11. The Canadian reaction should be that the two sides should now deal with all questions of control in a practical way pari passu with joint consideration of disarmament measures to be negotiated through a process of balanced concessions.

VI. FOREIGN BASES

12. The new Soviet proposals make provision in their first stage for the elimination of all foreign military bases. The proposals also call for the elimination of nuclear weapons in the first stage, and the Soviet delegation has in addition indicated its willingness to bring forward provisions for reductions in conventional forces into the first stage. The provision regarding military bases is therefore redundant; if the weapons for which the bases exist are eliminated, the reason for the existence of the bases themselves will automatically disappear. Furthermore, the West has had to develop a network of foreign bases because of its geographical position, while the Soviet Union and China have had less need for them because they occupy a compact continental land mass. What matters is not the location of bases, but the fact that the two systems of bases are part of balanced positions of opposing military strength. The Canadian position should be that whether a base is foreign or domestic is fundamentally irrelevant in the search for balanced disarmament.

VII. PEACE-KEEPING MACHINERY

13. The new Soviet proposals concede that should the militia forces which will continue to exist in a completely disarmed world be used for aggression, it may be necessary for the United Nations to collect forces to repel the aggressor, as provided for in Article 43 of the United Nations Charter. There are still uncertainties about what this apparent Soviet concession actually means. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union has moved a step towards the Western position and provided the basis for a package containing balanced concessions to both points of view. The Canadian reaction should be willingness to negotiate agreed conclusions in this area which would emphasize the ultimate responsibility of the United Nations for disarmament and the vital interest of other states in the safeguarding of peace. In the interests of focussing attention on more immediately significant matters, Canada would stress the need to concentrate at this time on practical measures rather than on theoretical studies relevant to some future stage.

RECOMMENDATION

14. That the suggested Canadian reaction to the Soviet disarmament proposals of June 2 be approved as guidance for the Canadian Representative to the Conference of the Ten Nation Committee.

DISARMAMENT

I would suggest the following to you very briefly:

1. I cannot see how we can expect to make any real progress on this subject until the new American administration is in office and ready to discuss the subject seriously. My appraisal of U.S. opinion now would be that it will not stand for anything that looks like a concession to the Russians at the present juncture and we cannot get any reasonable hope of agreement without something that can be alleged to have this appearance.

2. All those on the Western side will undoubtedly have a very unpleasant time in the U.N. General Assembly this fall over disarmament. The Russians will be in a good propaganda position and can be expected to exploit it to the full. It seems to me our position immediately is to try and protect ourselves as best we can against this propaganda onslaught without prejudicing the real bargaining position when serious discussion resumes next year.

3. In the last analysis, agreement on anything of significance on disarmament is agreement between the United States and Russia. It is agreement on something which the Americans hold to be so important that they are not going to be substantially influenced by "needling" on our part. They will have to be persuaded that the measures of substance we propose can be taken without imperilling U.S. and Western security.

4. There is a good deal in Mr. Green's paper today that seems to have merit but there are dangers in putting it forward in a matter that will cause a breach between us and the United States, particularly at this juncture. Therefore it would seem to be better as a line to be taken in discussion among the Western group, perhaps at NATO in the process of consultation, than to be put forward at the ten nation committee without consultation with our allies. There does not seem to be time for consultation if Burns is to speak tomorrow.

5. Consequently, if Burns is to speak tomorrow, it would seem wiser that he should speak in general terms and not say too much about the substance of the arrangements, but rather something to the effect that the Russian proposals have many points worthy of careful examination, as well as certain very obvious propaganda aspects, and to use this to work around to a position, which we could defend, of having to take some considerable time now to work on the substance of proposals that might have some opportunity of affording the basis for agreement.[66]

6. I feel myself that we should use the time available before serious negotiations can be resumed next winter to have a deeper look into the whole policy of disarmament by a somewhat wider group in Ottawa than that which has been working on it in recent months. It should be related not only to our own defence policy and its development, but also to our appraisal of the U.S. and U.K. and French positions as they seem likely to develop.

DISARMAMENT; POSITION TO BE TAKEN ON SOVIET PROPOSALS
(Previous reference January 26)

25. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said guidance should be provided to the Canadian Representative to the Conference of the Ten Nation Committee. The Soviet disarmament proposals of June 2nd included sufficient concessions to the Western point of view, and in particular to Canada's stand, that it would be unwise to dismiss the proposals as mere propaganda. The United States would probably adhere to the position they had taken on March 16th. Canada should speak for itself and should not merely echo the views of the United States and the United Kingdom.

In concert with other Western negotiating countries, Canada should now react with specific proposals for packaging proposals from each side that should be related to preserve balance and proposals that disclosed an underlying similarity of view.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, June 21 — Cab. Doc. 192-60).

26. Mr. Green went on to say that paragraph 12 of the explanatory memorandum should be amended to state that the Soviet proposal on foreign military bases was designed to secure political advantage and had no real bearing on disarmament.

27. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) The Soviet proposals were superficially attractive but were in reality predicated on a totally unacceptable principle. They called for the elimination of nuclear weapons in the first stage and for the simultaneous elimination of all foreign military bases, ostensibly on the ground that the elimination of the nuclear weapons would make the bases automatically redundant. In actual fact, however, if the U.S. withdrew from its foreign bases the Soviet superiority in conventional arms would enable them very quickly to over-run the whole of Europe. Rejection of the proposal in its present form was therefore vital to the survival of the Western countries.

(b) Paragraph 12 of the explanatory memorandum should be re-drafted to make clear, not just that the Soviet proposal on bases was designed for propaganda purposes, but that the principle could not in any circumstances be accepted.

(c) Some said the Canadian representative had been reluctant to take an initiative in the Committee but during this week he would present Canada's view in favour of package proposals. Others said that it was difficult for Canada at any time to take a substantially different line in the negotiations from that of other N.A.T.O. countries.

(d) Some members said that more time should, if possible, be given for study of such matters, to enable Ministers to consult their advisers before the time when a decision had to be made. Others said that in this particular case it had been impossible to provide more time, and that the instructions to General Burns should be determined on this day.

28. The Cabinet approved, as guidance for the Canadian Representative to the Conference of the Ten Nation Committee, a memorandum dated June 21st from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Cab. Doc. 192-60) on the suggested Canadian reaction to the Soviet disarmament proposals of June 2nd, subject to replacement of paragraph 12 of the memorandum by the following:

"VI. FOREIGN BASES

12. The first stage of the new Soviet plan, item 2, provides that all troops will be withdrawn from foreign territories and that foreign military bases of all kinds will be eliminated. The provision as regards foreign bases is clearly unacceptable to the West. The West has had to develop its network of foreign bases because of its geographical position, while the Soviet Union and China have had little need for bases because they occupy a compact continental land mass."

NEW UNITED STATES DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS

My preliminary reaction to the new United States disarmament proposals[67] is that they represent a serious attempt to meet a number of points which we and other members of the Western Five have raised in criticizing the March 16 proposals. They also represent an attempt to make a number of concessions to the Soviet point of view. If proposals along these lines are approved within the Five and by the North Atlantic Council and advanced next week in the Ten Nation Committee, I believe that there would be a fresh impetus to the negotiations, as we have insisted.

2. In most important respects, the new United States proposals appear to reflect the same considerations which you laid before the Cabinet yesterday. In particular, from the Canadian point of view, there are a number of appropriate references to the United Nations. The first stage of the new proposals contains actual measures of disarmament rather than merely studies, as the Canadian Delegation has always argued should have been the case. On the question of nuclear disarmament, provision is made in the first stage of the new United States proposals for cutting off the production of fissionable material for weapons and transferring this material to peaceful uses. The first stage also provides, in relation to nuclear disarmament, for a prohibition on placing weapons of mass destruction in outer space, in addition to making provision for prior notification of missile launchings. In that the new proposals contain a number of concessions to the Soviet point of view, they also correspond to the Canadian insistence that negotiation should be stimulated by the beginning of a process of balanced concessions. In general, the presentation of the new proposals represents a great improvement over the former Western proposals, and from this point of view will provide a much more satisfactory basis for the Western position at the forthcoming session of the United Nations General Assembly. This also meets a point on which the Canadian view has been firmly stated.

3. Considered as representing a series of concessions to the Soviet point of view, the new proposals contain the following features:

(a) Actual measures of disarmament, including reduction in convention forces from 2.5 to 2.1 million for the United States and Soviet Union, have been introduced into the first stage;

(b) Consistent with the Soviet emphasis in their June 2 proposals on nuclear weapons (and with French insistence on dealing with the problem of means of delivery) provision is made for cutting off production of fissionable material for nuclear weapons and its transfer to peaceful uses; and initial preparations for controlling nuclear delivery systems are made;

[67] Voir/See Documents on International Affairs 1960 (London: Oxford University Press/Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1964), pp. 85-89.

(c) Concessions of form and procedure are made, in that the United States accepts a modified version of the Soviet treaty concept, agrees to a modified version of the Soviet concept of disarmament according to a time table, and accepts the Soviet suggestion that the International Disarmament Organization should be clearly specified to be a control body.

(d) In the second stage further substantial disarmament measures, including a reduction of conventional forces to the level of 1.7 million for the United States and the Soviet Union are provided for and provisions also made for actual destruction of agreed categories of nuclear weapons and delivery systems ranging from missiles to artillery.

4. One point of criticism of the presentation of the new proposals which you might wish to make to the United States Ambassador has to do with the first sentence of the introduction to the proposals, where it is stated that "The ultimate goal is a secure and peaceful world of free and open societies." I wonder whether the reference to "open societies" will have as much public attraction outside the United States as those who drafted these proposals may believe. The concept of an open society as it is understood in the United States is probably different from the concept which Canadians have of such a society, to say nothing of the different views on this point which may be held in the uncommitted countries and in the Soviet Union itself. Since this language was presumably included to make as wide an appeal as possible to international public opinion, particularly in the uncommitted world, perhaps it might be better to alter the reference to "open societies" to take account of the sensitivity of newly independent nations who might conceivably look on this objective as a threat to their recently acquired sovereignty. In other words, it may not be in the best interests of the West to indicate at the outset of their presentation of a generally attractive new set of disarmament proposals that their ultimate reason for wanting disarmament is to open up other people's countries.

5. Perhaps it would be better to retain the wording of the March 16 proposals, which speak of the ultimate goal of "a secure, free and peaceful world." To my knowledge, the statement of the Western goal in this form has never been a cause of adverse comment, either from the Soviet bloc or from the uncommitted countries.

Le président du Conseil des ministres de l'Union soviétique au premier ministre

[Moscow, June 27, 1960]

Translation from Russian

Mr. Prime Minister,

I have received your letter of the 6th June.† I must tell you that the state of matters in the Ten-Nation Committee on Disarmament causes us serious concern.

As you know, Mr. Prime Minister, on the 18th of September, 1959 the Soviet Government submitted for the consideration of the United Nations Organization a program of general and complete disarmament. Desirous of making a new contribution to the cause of safeguarding peace and creating the most favourable conditions for reaching agreement on general and complete disarmament, the Supreme Soviet of the USSR adopted on the 15th of January, 1960, a law concerning a new considerable reduction of the Soviet armed forces by 1,200,000 men.

In an endeavour to achieve as soon as possible a workable agreement on the urgent problem of disarmament, the Soviet Government, developing its program of disarmament put forward on the 18th of September, 1959, had worked out and prepared for discussion at the conference of the leaders of the four powers detailed proposals concerning the realization of general and complete disarmament. In these proposals we took into account the considerations expressed by the western powers in respect of a number of important points, more particularly concerning the priority of the prohibition and elimination of all means of delivery of nuclear weapons, including the abolition of military bases, details of control of disarmament, measures for the safeguarding of peace and security under conditions of complete disarmament, and others.

Since as a result of the provocative actions undertaken by the US Government in respect of the Soviet Union the conference at the summit was wrecked, the Soviet Government, taking into account that the consideration of the problem of disarmament tolerates no delaying attitude, has forwarded the proposals it had prepared to the governments of all nations and submitted them to the Ten-Nation Committee for consideration. These proposals were supported by the governments of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Roumania and Bulgaria, which are members of the Committee, and by the governments of a number of other nations.

In forwarding to you our letter dated 2nd June a.c., we hoped that the Canadian Government, in accordance with its repeated statements about the necessity of reaching general and complete disarmament, would receive with understanding the new Soviet proposals concerning disarmament and would make an effort towards achieving progress in the work of the Ten-Nations Committee on Disarmament. It must, however, be said that the delegations of the Western powers, including Canada, have adopted in this Committee an attitude aimed at anything but success in the cause of disarmament. Not only do they do, on their part, nothing to facilitate the soonest possible agreement on disarmament, but on the contrary, they appear to have chosen for their purpose to do everything to prevent such agreement, to channel all the Committee's work away from the solution of the practical problems of disarmament, and to drown the cause of disarmament in fruitless and endless discussions on the subject of control without disarmament.

More than three months have elapsed since the Committee of the Ten began its work in Geneva. For its consideration, the Soviet Union has submitted concrete, detailed plans for disarmament under effective international control, while readiness was expressed to examine any constructive considerations of the other members of the Committee, directed towards reaching general and complete disarmament. Meanwhile the Western powers, whose governments had only recently voted for a resolution of the UNO General Assembly in favour of general and complete disarmament, are in fact avoiding in the Committee examination of any concrete proposals concerning disarmament.

On their part, Canada, the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy have advanced in the Committee of the Ten a plan which, with the best of intentions, cannot be considered as a plan for disarmament. Rather, it is a plan for control with disarmament, i.e. for legalized military espionage, which is known greatly to appeal to certain circles in the West. In actual fact the Western powers are attempting to reduce the whole matter to the establishment of control of intercontinental ballistic missiles and artificial Earth satellites. It is easy to guess the meaning of such a plan: it represents an attempt to secure unilateral military advantages for the NATO powers to the detriment of the safety of the Soviet Union. Naturally, no agreement is possible on this basis. The endeavour to prevent agreement on the problems of disarmament is obviously the purpose which the Western powers have set for themselves in their work as members of the Committee of the Ten. The latter is being used by these powers as a screen by which they try to conceal their unwillingness to disarm.

The experience of the negotiations in the Ten-Nation Committee has shown that the governments of the Western nations which take part in the work of that Committee obviously do not wish for the prohibition and destruction of such a terrible weapons of mass destruction as the atomic and hydrogen weapons. All concrete proposals regarding these problems are systematically rejected by the representatives of the Western powers under various pretexts, and everything is drowned in fruitless discussion.

Instead of discussing concrete measures of disarmament, the Western representatives are attempting to justify military preparations and the existence of a network of numerous bases on foreign territories. I must tell you, Mr. Prime Minister, that the Canadian representative in the Committee of the Ten is no exception in this respect. The stand taken by the Canadian representative in the Committee of the Ten raises the legitimate question whether it reflects the influence of that line in international affairs which is pursued by the US government and which has prevented fruitful discussion of the most important international problems by the heads of the four powers.

Looking at matters realistically, it must be said that as a result of the position adopted by the Western powers, the work of the Committee of the Ten has reached an impasse, has degenerated into fruitless battles of words, while the Committee itself has become anything but an organ for the promotion of the cause of disarmament. Manifestly, there are influential forces in the West, which are not interested in the realization of disarmament and are attempting by all means to obstruct agreement on disarmament, and that these forces have succeeded in putting their stamp on the position of the Western powers in the Committee of the Ten. Surely, not only does that Committee fail to promote the cause of disarmament but on the contrary, does it a great deal of harm in so far as it misleads the nations by creating illusions as though something were done in the field of disarmament, while in actual fact the Western powers are again stepping up the arms race, which from day to day increases the hazard of a destructive nuclear rocket war.

The Soviet Government cannot accept such a state of affairs. It cannot agree that the participation of the Soviet Union in the Committee of the Ten, whose sincere pursuit of agreement on disarmament is well known, be used as a screen to cover up activities that have nothing in common with actual disarmament.

We should like to believe that the stand taken at the present time by the Canadian representative in the Committee of the Ten is not the last word of the Government of Canada. We should like to hope that the Canadian Government, whose leaders, including yourself, Mr. Prime Minister, have repeatedly recognized the necessity of solving the problem of disarmament, will in all seriousness examine the position which has arisen in the Ten-Nation Committee on Disarmament.

I am telling you quite frankly, Mr. Prime Minister, that the Soviet Government, having examined the position which has arisen in the Committee, has come to the conclusion that, judging by the position adopted by their representatives in Geneva, the Western powers do not desire serious negotiations on disarmament. They obviously have their own special considerations which have nothing in common with the task of disarmament. This is reflected in the continuing arms race pursued by the above-mentioned powers and in the fact that in the course of the disarmament discussions in the Committee they only attempt to make a show of negotiation and thereby to deceive the peoples whose sincere aim it is that the problem of disarmament should find its solution.

Taking all this into consideration, the Government of the USSR has come to the conclusion that it must discontinue its participation in the fruitless discussion in the Committee of the Ten in order to submit for the consideration of the next session of the UNO General Assembly the problem of disarmament and of the situation which has arisen regarding the implementation of the resolution of the General Assembly, dated November 20, 1959, on this problem. Apparently, this also raises the question of the composition of the Committee.

The Soviet Government is firmly convinced that the problem of disarmament, on which depend the destinies of peace or war, can and must find its practical solution, and that no artificial obstacles in this great cause, no procrastination can be tolerated.

These, Mr. Prime Minister, are the considerations concerning the problem of disarmament, which I thought it was my duty to impart to you.

Respectfully,

N. KHRUSHCHEV

DISARMAMENT: WESTERN RESPONSE TO SOVIET WALKOUT

We were called to the State Department by Francis Wilcox, (Assistant Secretary of International Organization Affairs) this afternoon along with officials of the other missions on the Western side of the Geneva disarmament talks. The purpose of the meeting was to put forward a USA proposal, which we understand has the approval of Secretary Herter, that the five Western governments, in the face of the abrupt Soviet withdrawal, should take prompt action to request the Secretary-General of the UN to convene the Disarmament Commission for the purpose of reviewing the Ten Power proceedings, and to secure the support of the Commission for resumption of the Ten Power disarmament negotiations. The State Department hopes that if this proposal is agreed it will be possible to take action in New York on Wednesday or Thursday of this week, and to provide for the convening of the Disarmament Commission on Wednesday or Thursday of next week (July 6 or 7).

2. As outlined by Wilcox, the principal reasons for proposing this action are to retain the initiative which has been given to the Western Powers as a result of the Soviet action in Geneva, and to bring the case for resumed negotiations before the world forum provided by the present Disarmament Commission. In addition, the State Department has in mind that the Soviets have proposed the inscription of two items for the agenda of the next session of the General Assembly. Wilcox also said that they considered there was a possibility that one or other "neutral" members of the UN might propose a meeting of the Disarmament Commission (he said that they had no repeat no direct evidence of this but that it was, they thought, a possibility) and that it was preferable for the Western Powers concerned with disarmament to make a prompt report on the Geneva proceedings to the Commission and seek the support of its membership for the resumption of negotiations.

3. In the course of discussion it was clear that the State Department had already considered and rejected the suggestion (see Geneva Disarmament Delegation telegram 974 June 27)† for a special session of the General Assembly, and also the possibility of convening the Security Council, which raised problems of representation, and which failed to meet what is regarded as desirable, i.e. that the principal organ of the UN concerned with disarmament should be promptly informed of the present state of the Geneva discussions, and should bring its weight to bear to have them resumed.

4. The State Department provided us with the very tentative drafts of a covering letter to the Secretary-General, and a draft resolution which might be put before the Disarmament Commission, emphasizing that their views on the content both of the covering letter and of the draft were flexible. In particular, Wilcox recognized that it might not repeat not be appropriate for the Five Western Powers, whose association with this proposed action is requested, to transmit USA proposals which have been recently introduced in the Geneva discussions. The text of the draft covering letter and draft resolution are contained in my telegram 1633 June 27.

5. In the course of discussion, two principal substantive points were raised. UK Embassy representative expressed the view that to place the disarmament problem at this stage before the Disarmament Commission might result in opening up the whole question of membership of the Ten Power group, and might also involve a substantive debate at a time when the Western position is not repeat not yet fully agreed. The State Department officials present recognized these possibilities, but considered that the Disarmament Commission should not repeat not be ignored and that the prospects of an orderly outcome would be facilitated by concerted initiative on the part of the Western Five as an urgent follow-up procedure to the deadlock in Geneva. They added that the greatest importance was attached to the continuation in Geneva by the Western delegations of their efforts to arrive at an agreed plan, and USA delegation had received instructions in this sense. In canvassing informally the various ways in which an effort might be made to bring about a resumption of negotiation, we referred to the possibility of calling for a meeting of the representatives at the appropriate level of the Ten Powers specifically concerned with disarmament. It was the view of the State Department officials, however, that the UN was the appropriate framework for follow-up action at this time.

6. It was agreed that we should request urgent instructions from our governments on the principle of taking action on the lines proposed, it being recognized that the drafts of the letter and their proposed resolution would be subject to close scrutiny once the basic decision of principle had been taken.

7. Your early comments are requested.

DISARMAMENT: WESTERN RESPONSE TO SOVIET WALKOUT

After speaking to the Under-Secretary this afternoon, I have informed the State Department that the Canadian Government agree to the calling of a special meeting of the Disarmament Commission as proposed by USA. I have also reaffirmed the urgency which we attach to the earliest possible composition of Western views in the production of an agreed Western plan.

2. The State Department told us this afternoon that the British had agreed, as we knew, to the reference to the UN Disarmament Commission; also the Italians have now given their consent. They expected that they would hear favourably from the French later this afternoon.

3. We understand that the State Department consider that the detailed discussions between the interested delegations on the procedure and form of the request for the convening of the Commission could most appropriately take place between our delegations in New York.

Le premier ministre
au président du Conseil des ministres de l'Union soviétique

Prime Minister to Chairman, Council of Ministers of Soviet Union

Ottawa, June 30, 1960

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I have received your letter of June 27 announcing the decision of your Government to discontinue its participation in the work of the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee. The action of the Soviet Delegation and the delegations of Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Roumania in leaving the Committee without warning gives cause for serious regret and concern. I find these developments deeply disquieting.

At the outset, let me dispose of the charges you level at the positions taken by the Western delegations, particularly by the Canadian representative. Your remarks seem to me not so much concerned with the conduct of the negotiations as with the aim of creating differences among the Western delegations.

If your allegations against the Canadian Government are seriously meant, they constitute a transparent misrepresentation of Canada's position. The Canadian Government has throughout adopted in the Ten Nation Committee a strong and independent stand in support of balanced concessions leading towards agreement. Furthermore, despite all setbacks we have not ceased to advocate in other fields the continuance of a policy of negotiation with a view to the restoration of mutual confidence between the Soviet and Western worlds.

The seriousness of the Canadian Government's interest and purpose in embarking on the disarmament negotiations has been amply demonstrated. On a number of occasions, most recently on June 24, the Canadian Delegation made detailed suggestions designed to bring the Ten Nation Committee to grips with the task of real negotiation. Unfortunately, the Soviet Union and its allies did not respond to these suggestions or to a number of other Western proposals to move towards specific measures of disarmament.

Indeed I find it difficult to understand the logic of your Government's action in discontinuing these important talks at this juncture. At the time of the failure of the Summit meeting, the Canadian Government took the view that all the other East-West negotiations then proceeding automatically assumed greater importance, since they constituted a useful means through which the deterioration of international relations could be checked. In the view of the Canadian Government the situation demanded that the members of the Committee put behind them the opening phases of the negotiations and proceed immediately with their task.

It was in this spirit that on June 6 I replied to your earlier letter enclosing the new Soviet disarmament proposals of June 2. The Canadian Government, along with the other Western governments participating in the Ten Nation Committee, found your revised proposals worthy of careful study. In this connection, I would call your attention to the following remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons on June 15, 1960,

> "The Canadian Government wants these proposals to receive a patient and searching examination in the Ten Nation Committee, as marking the opening of a phase of detailed, business-like and uninterrupted negotiations. We believe there should be no hasty, ill-considered reaction to the new Soviet proposals, but the most careful and constructive examination of these proposals in the Committee which circumstances permit."

Nevertheless, your revised proposals embodied a number of provisions which differed materially from those you submitted to the United Nations on September 18, 1959. It was not unreasonable, therefore, that the submission of your proposals of June 2 should have given rise to a series of probing questions by the Western side in the course of the ensuing sessions of the Ten Nation Committee. Nothing in your letter explains why, during the same period, the Soviet Government and its allies began to give public indications of an intention to break off the negotiations. Such actions stand in odd contrast with your professed desire for genuine negotiations, and scarcely reflect a recognition of the urgency and importance of the work of the Committee.

My greatest difficulty is in understanding why the Soviet Government chose to break off the negotiations when it was aware that the Western countries were about to introduce new proposals which, together with the Soviet proposals of June 2, gave promise of bringing new life into the negotiations. A full opportunity was offered to the Soviet Union and its allies to reconsider its position on the day following the withdrawal of the Soviet and other Eastern delegations. That opportunity was not taken.

It had always been my understanding that the General Assembly of the United Nations would have an opportunity periodically to review the work of the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee. I had assumed that the next session of the General Assembly would provide the first such occasion. I had hoped that, rather than return to the United Nations with a record of failure, the Ten Nation Committee could instead have reported progress. You suggest in your letter that progress in the negotiations was not to be expected. My conclusion is that there was every chance for progress at the time of the Committee's precipitate adjournment.

When you have had an opportunity to study the new proposals from the Western side, I hope you will agree that these proposals show that the Western countries are sincerely desirous of reaching a disarmament agreement. I hope too that on reflection you will find it possible to authorize your representative to resume participation in the vital work of the Ten Nation Committee.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

[JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER]

DISARMAMENT — WESTERN RESPONSE TO SOVIET WALKOUT

We have now had an opportunity to take soundings with a number or representatives of "uncommitted" countries on the projected meeting of the Disarmament Commission. These countries include Sweden, India, Ceylon, Yugoslavia, Japan, Israel, the UAR, Lebanon and Pakistan. In our talks with these representatives we have in accordance with your instructions strongly emphasized the desirability in our view of an early meeting of the Commission.

2. We have particularly pointed out the responsibility of the Disarmament Commission. We have reminded them that the Disarmament Commission only agreed to the Ten-Power Committee undertaking negotiations in the hope that it would produce more effective progress towards disarmament than the larger 82-member body and that now owing to the action of the Russians in breaking off discussion just when the Western Powers were coming forward with new and positive proposals the work of the Ten-Power Committee has been brought to a halt. In this connection we have mentioned the Canadian approach in favour of "package deals" speaking along the lines of your statement in the House of Commons of yesterday and General Burns' statement in the Ten-Power Committee on June 24. We have encountered sympathy and approval for the Canadian position in the disarmament negotiations.

3. We have also emphasized in our conversations the potential danger of a gap of several months without any continuity in negotiation over disarmament and the need for some kind of guidance from the UN which would call upon the parties to resume negotiation in the spirit of the Security Council Resolution S/4328 of May 27.[68]

4. The response to our overtures has been mixed. There has been, as I say, a ready acknowledgment of the part that Canada has played at Geneva, but a very tepid reaction from all delegations mentioned to the proposals for an early meeting of the Disarmament Commission. This latter attitude seems based upon the fairly widespread view in these countries that an early meeting of the Commission would in effect be an American inspired propaganda move aimed at putting on the record that the Russians had been in the wrong in breaking up the Geneva talks. For such an operation there is little enthusiasm; the Secretary-General's attitude as outlined in his press conference today (see our telegram 843 June 30)† can only have the effect of discouraging still further any enthusiasm for an early meeting.

5. In view of the fact that we favour an early meeting of the Commission, it seems, looking at this question from the point of view of UN opinion that if we are to make an impact on the uncommitted countries, whose support will be essential if a meeting takes place, we shall have to try to give the proposal for a meeting a complexion which is more likely to attract opinion here. With this end in view, I venture to suggest that the Canadian position might take into account the following factors:

(1) As part of an effort to convince the uncommitted countries that the purpose of the Western Powers is not repeat not merely to score propaganda points off the Russians, it would be useful to go through the motions of consulting the Russians in advance of such a meeting in order to give them an opportunity to agree to it or alternatively to reject our offer of cooperation;

(2) It seems desirable that if possible the Disarmament Commission should be called at the instance of its Chairman (Nervo) as this would be a recognition of the responsibility of the Commission (as contrasted with the initiative of the Western Powers) and might have some influence in associating the Latin-Americans with a positive approach towards the meeting;

(3) It seems important that we should not repeat not approach the meeting on the Western side with a cut and dried resolution in the name of the Western Five as this might be regarded, however praiseworthy in form, as a Western propaganda initiative. If a satisfactory resolution could come (or be stimulated) from the uncommitted countries as in the case of the Security Council Resolution of May 27, it would be more effective as a demonstration of world opinion and in terms of gaining votes than a purely Western resolution;

(4) To the extent that a meeting of the Disarmament Commission may involve discussion (although not repeat not decision) on the question of the addition to the Ten-Power Committee of other UN members (e.g. India or Yugoslavia) it will be important not repeat not to discourage such proposals if they have fairly widespread support, as we do not repeat not wish to be in a position of appearing to oppose the participation of uncommitted countries, if this is proposed by the Soviet Union.

6. If due consideration is not repeat not given to uncommitted UN opinion, we run a serious risk of rebuff in the Disarmament Commission and even more so in the General Assembly when 15 additional new African votes may be added to the neutral element in the Assembly. On the other hand, by stressing the positive elements in the proposal for a Disarmament Commission meeting, and making clear our Canadian contribution at Geneva, we shall be more apt to attract UN sympathy for our position and thus dispel the suggestion which is being propagated in UN circles by the Soviet Mission that the Commission meeting is a propaganda exercise. This does not repeat not of course imply that we should refrain from putting the blame where it lies for the break-off at Geneva.

7. Meanwhile I am sorry to say that the divergencies I have already reported between the views of the USA Permanent Representative here and of the State Department and the complication resulting from the French position plus the incessant press rumours coming from the USA delegation have produced an embarrassing impression of contradiction and confusion on the Western side which can only be a source of satisfaction to the Soviet delegation and of perplexity to our friends.

CONVENING THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

You should make use of the following arguments in urging on your colleagues the need to convene the Disarmament Commission.

2. First, United Nations has the ultimate responsibility for disarmament under its Charter; in the absence of active negotiations for disarmament outside the United Nations, it becomes all the more incumbent on the organization to take action to discharge its responsibilities. Canada is perhaps better placed than any other member of the Five Western Nations on the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee to argue this position. Canada accepted the invitation to serve on the Committee on the understanding that even though the Ten Nation Committee was only loosely associated with the United Nations, the principle of the ultimate responsibility of the United Nations for disarmament would be preserved. Furthermore, Canadian representatives have consistently argued throughout the preparation of the Western disarmament position and in the Ten Nation Committee for positions designed to take proper account of the role of the United Nations in disarmament specified in the Charter. The Canadian government is therefore not open to the charge that it only wishes the United Nations to discuss disarmament when all else fails. From this point of view, the Canadian attitude has been akin to that of a number of the smaller countries who, although they have reiterated many times that disarmament is not simply a matter for the Great Powers but for the United Nations as a whole, now appear to be opposed to the convening of the Disarmament Commission.

3. Second, the logical instrument through which the Charter responsibilities of the United Nations can be discharged is the Disarmament Commission. It is true that this is now a cumbersome body which could easily become a propaganda forum. Nevertheless, it is the only United Nations body which exists. It is worth remembering that some of the countries which are now evidently opposed to convening the Disarmament Commission on the grounds that only a propaganda debate would result are the same countries which took the lead in converting the Disarmament Commission into its present form.

4. From this point of view, countries like India and Yugoslavia which co-sponsored the resolution to enlarge the membership of the Disarmament Commission at the 13th Session, are particularly vulnerable. The record of the debates in the First Committee are worth consulting on this point (summary of records of the 13th Session at page 103 and following). In justifying the enlargement of the Disarmament Commission at that time, the Indian and Yugoslav representatives envisaged that the Disarmament Commission would act in just such a situation as now exists. Therefore we find it hard to see how they could easily argue that in the present circumstances the Disarmament Commission should not meet. In 1958 Lall said, for example, that "it was logical and reasonable for all states to be in a position to meet — continuously, if necessary, but certainly at any time — in order to consider disarmament issues." In the same debate Vidic argued that the enlarged Disarmament Commission "might avert the danger of a continuing deadlock in disarmament negotiations and it would stress the common responsibility of all member states in the matter and permit them to contribute to a solution."

5. Representatives opposed to the convening of the Disarmament Commission may argue that such a move lead only to a propaganda debate. Part of the answer to this argument has been given above; that is, that if the Disarmament Commission in its present form lends itself to propaganda debates, this can hardly be said to be the fault of the Western countries who have no other machinery to call on in the present circumstances. But a much more important argument, in our view, is that it is only the Soviet bloc which maintains that a propaganda debate would result. So far as the Western countries are concerned, and certainly so far as Canada is concerned, we have no interest in a propaganda debate. On the other hand, since there was hope of progress in the negotiations if the Soviet bloc delegations had only stayed long enough to permit their proposals of June 2 and the new Western proposals to be considered together, we do not see why the negotiations need to have been interrupted in the first place. Sooner or later, they will have to be resumed. If, as it appears to us, there was the material for serious negotiation in the situation which immediately preceded the Soviet bloc withdrawal, we fail to see why steps should not be taken to make the interruption in the negotiations as brief as possible. Furthermore, if it is the Soviet estimate that nothing but a propaganda debate on disarmament may be possible until a new administration is in power in the United States, then we see no reason why it would be preferable to wait until the General Assembly to have such a debate. Surely it would be better to clear the air in the Disarmament Commission now rather than allow the situation to deteriorate through inaction for another three months. The Assembly session could then be used, if necessary, for constructive steps to restore the negotiations if the Soviet bloc continues to make this impossible for the time being.

6. You might point out, if other representatives fear a propaganda debate as a result of a Western initiative to convene the Disarmament Commission, that nothing in the recent record of Western participation in the disarmament negotiations would bear out the Soviet charge that the West's intentions are not serious. On the contrary, the unanimous Western reaction to the Soviet proposals of June 2 was that they should be given serious consideration by the Ten Nation Committee. There was no disposition to seize upon the obvious propaganda content of the latest Soviet proposals in order to dismiss them out of hand. Even more convincing is the fact that the Western countries were on the verge of introducing new proposals which made as many concessions to the Soviet point of view as the June 2 Soviet proposals had made to the Western point of view. Canada's interest in serious negotiations as opposed to propaganda has been reiterated time and again, and as recently as June 24, General Burns made an extended statement in the Ten Nation Committee giving Canadian suggestions for bringing the negotiators to grips with their task. If there is one single factor to account for the present rupture in the negotiations, it seems to us that it is the Soviet decision — which is completely belied by the preparation of new Western disarmament proposals — to break off the negotiations in the mistaken belief that it is impossible to do business with the present United States administration.

7. In these circumstances, we believe that the United Nations would be failing its responsibilities if it did not take action to bring about a resumption of the negotiations. This is particularly so since the propaganda debate which some of your colleagues evidently wish to avoid will probably take place in the General Assembly unless something is done immediately to prevent this. It seems to us that those nations which took the lead in creating a Disarmament Commission designed to represent the interests of all the smaller countries and to provide alternative machinery for negotiation in the event of Great Power disagreement have a particular responsibility to take positive action at this juncture.

8. In addition to the foregoing arguments, you will be aware that paragraphs 3 and 6 of the Disarmament Commission's Resolution of September 10, 1959 provide the legal basis for reports to the Commission from the Ten-Nation Committee.

DISARMAMENT — WESTERN RESPONSE TO SOVIET WALKOUT — SECRETARY-GENERAL'S VIEWS

I called on the Secretary-General this morning to put to him the view of the Canadian Government that an early meeting of the Disarmament Commission was most desirable. I used the arguments outlined in my telegram 846 June 30 (and which I will therefore not repeat not rehearse again here). In particular I emphasized the responsibility of the Disarmament Commission in the sphere of disarmament and pointed out that if no action were taken to achieve progress in disarmament in the UN there might be considerable disillusionment in many quarters with the UN. I emphasized that in Canada public opinion was strongly in favour of very early action.

2. The Secretary-General said in reply that he fully shared the Canadian position with regard to the responsibility of UN. He thought that the earliest appropriate time for a Disarmament Commission meeting might be at the end of July or the beginning of August. Mr. Hammarskjöld said that he believed that such a meeting should be called by the Chairman of the Commission. He said that Mr. Nervo might notify members that he proposed to call an early meeting of the Commission after taking the necessary soundings with the 82 members as to the question of the actual date of the meeting. He had asked himself the question whether a meeting in the immediate future of the Disarmament Commission would further the real cause of disarmament and after due consideration and taking soundings in many quarters he had come to the definite conclusion that it would not repeat not. This he said was the essential question. Mr. Hammarskjöld went on to say that he believed that a meeting in the immediate post Geneva breakdown atmosphere would be characterized by a bitter cold war debate in which the USA and Soviet Union would inevitably both become involved in reciprocal accusations and no repeat no real progress would be made. He thought that many of the smaller and middle powers would be most reluctant to be lined up in such a debate. In the circumstances he considered that it was essential that there should be a cooling off period after Geneva.

3. I pointed out that so far as Canada was concerned we were not repeat not concerned with a propaganda debate in the Disarmament Commission but as our record in Geneva showed in furthering substantive measures of disarmament that we would approach the Disarmament Commission meeting in this spirit. The Secretary-General replied that he had never doubted that this would be the Canadian position.

4. Turning to the question of the composition of any future body dealing with disarmament, Mr. Hammarskjöld expressed the view that we should return to the principle of a subcommittee of the UN. If the Ten Power group had been a UN body, the Soviet walkout would have had no repeat no effect on the continued existence of the body in question but would have been similar to Soviet walkout from the Security Council. A UN body would have continuous legal existence. He said he therefore thought there was a case for considering the creation of a new subcommittee of the UN although its composition would not repeat not be on the five-five basis of the Geneva group, but would have additional membership.

CONVENING THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

The representatives of the Western Five disarmament missions met at the State Department at noon today with Wilcox and other officials. Wilcox began by saying that since our last meeting on Monday the Department had given additional thought to the question of convening the Disarmament Commission. This re-examination had taken place in the light of the reports received from the Permanent Representative in New York, the French Ambassador's approach of yesterday in which he had expressed serious reservations on the course of conduct proposed, and the Secretary-General's comments at yesterday's press conference. In addition Cabot Lodge had met yesterday with the Secretary and other senior officials (including Bohlen and Kohler) for a review of the problem. As a result of these various elements and having in mind that the Five Powers have not repeat not yet hammered out a agreed Western position, the State Department now considered that a decision on convening the Disarmament Commission should not repeat not be taken at this time, but that as a first step the Western Powers ought to seek their objectives through diplomatic channels. In particular they should proceed with their replies to the Khrushchev letters, reiterate in these replies their preparedness to continue to negotiate and see what response these replies bring. In the light of this, it would then be desirable to review the position in Washington to see what further steps are possible and desirable.

2. I used the arguments set out in your telegram to Permis New York under reference as well as those in your earlier message 3400 June 28† to make the case in detail for an earlier convening of the Disarmament Commission on the lines of the original USA proposal. Our position was given full support by UK Embassy representative who said that UK views were identical to those we had outlined. Lord Hood said that the Western Powers would give the appearance of indefiniteness if an early initiative in the Disarmament Commission which was the logical forum were not repeat not taken. There were risks in any course, but on balance, a debate in the Disarmament Commission carried less risk than for example a debate in the Security Council. The smaller countries in the Commission would be unable to argue that the Ten Powers had monopolized the disarmament problem. If action could be taken quickly UK position was still to support the original American proposal.

3. The French Embassy representative recited the arguments which Alphand had put to the Secretary yesterday. In the French view the risks of the proposed course outweigh its advantages. It was impossible to estimate what ultimate action an 82-member forum might endorse, and it was by no repeat no means clear that the Ten-Power negotiating group would emerge unchanged. Secondly, on substance there was a real danger that in the absence of a common plan, divergences of views on the Western side would be swiftly exposed. Further the reaction of the smaller and uncommitted countries could not repeat not be predicted. The propaganda position of the West was already strong and there was doubt whether a debate in the Disarmament Commission would strengthen it. The Italian representative said his government had accepted the original proposal but in the light of reports received over the last day or two now saw some serious drawbacks. He therefore kept the Italian position open.

4. After some further discussion of these points Wilcox said that personally he found himself in a considerable measure of agreement with the view set forth in your message. He added however that there was evidence that their earlier concern lest one or other of the smaller powers should take the initiative in convening the Commission had proved unfounded. USA group had looked at alternative suggestions, for example, convening the Security Council, but had considered that this might engage some members of the Western Five on other issues, and in any event might ensue in a meeting of the wider Disarmament Commission. They had also been somewhat concerned about the question how far the Western Powers could get now into matters of substance in view of the present lack of Western agreement. On this last point we emphasized (see your message 408 June 30)† the need for the Western Powers to continue their efforts to reach a united Western position, whatever final decisions on tactics may be reached. Wilcox concluded that they had not repeat not come to a final decision and that the question of further procedure should be reviewed collectively after the effect of the replies to the Khrushchev letters could be assessed. He also indicated (and this I believe is a significant point) that in his estimate the Soviets would not repeat not negotiate seriously on disarmament with USA over the next few months.

4. Wilcox said that in view of the positions taken he planned to report our discussion to the Secretary, and made the suggestion to which we gave support that the group might reconvene later today in the light of his discussion with the Secretary. On the basis of this meeting it seems clear that an early Five Power agreement cannot now be obtained to proceed to convene the Disarmament Commission, and that possible alternative courses must be examined in this light. We are sending a suggestion in an accompanying message.[69]

5. In the meantime the State Department hoped that any public or press comment on the position could be confined to indicating that consultations on possible action are still in process.

Le président du Conseil des ministres de l'Union soviétique au premier ministre

Chairman, Council of Ministers of Soviet Union, to Prime Minister

[Moscow, July 23, 1960]

Unofficial translation

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I have attentively read your message of June 30, 1960 and I must tell you, that it has confirmed once again the correctness of the Soviet Government's decision to interrupt its participation in the work of the Ten Nation Committee on disarmament and to transfer the discussion of this subject, as well as of the situation obtaining in the Ten Nation Committee, for the consideration of the next session of the U.N. General Assembly.

Indeed your message actually repeats [the] usual assertions of the opponents of disarmament to the effect that the Soviet Union by its last actions allegedly wanted to create differences among the Western powers represented in the Ten Nation Committee. It is hardly necessary now to dwell once more on these assertions in detail, since the Soviet Government has never set itself such an objective and does not now.

And now some remarks to the point. By submitting its proposals of June 2, 1960, the Soviet Government stressed all the importance of the disarmament question after the proposed summit conference was broken down. That is why it decided to submit for the consideration of the Ten Nation Committee its new plan which to a great extent met the Western powers' wishes and, in particular, on such questions as the ban and elimination of all means of delivery of nuclear weapons to the target, maintenance of international peace under the conditions of general and complete disarmament, detailed outline of the provisions for establishment of international control, and others. Thus the Soviet Government hoped that this proposal would enable the Committee to put an end, as is stated in your message, to "the opening phases of the negotiations" and to proceed with its main task in a business-like way.

Unfortunately, these hopes of the Soviet Union have not been justified, and the Western powers in the Ten Nation Committee during almost the whole month were engaged not in concrete discussion of the new Soviet proposals on the basic provisions of a treaty on general and complete disarmament which were under its consideration, but — in fruitless logomachy which once again demonstrated their unwillingness to embark on a serious discussion of concrete problems of disarmament. Now attempts are being made to picture the matter in such a way as if the Soviet Union desired to avoid discussing the proposals which were put forward by the American representative on June 27 after the termination of the work of the Ten Nation Committee. Since however these proposals are mentioned, let us dwell on them to a certain extent.

The first reading of the American document which is presented under a pretentious title as "The program of general and complete disarmament under effective international control" shows that these "new" proposals are actually the old proposals of the Western powers of March 16 slightly revised, the perversity and unacceptability of which were already proved at the very first stage of the work of the Ten Nation Committee in March-April of this year.

Indeed in the American plan as well as in the proposals of the Western powers of March 16 all the attention just from the first stage is concentrated on establishing broad measures of control without implementing any disarmament measures, and the question is confined to concluding an agreement only on this first stage.

These proposals provide neither the abolishment of means of delivery of nuclear weapons to target, nor the ban of these weapons. Nor do they contain provisions for dismantling foreign military bases on the territories of other states or for withdrawing foreign troops from these territories.

Making no suggestions on any reduction of armed forces at the first stage the USA at the same time is seeking to bring under foreign control all the armed forces and armaments of the USSR and other states.[70] However this is nothing but an intention to implement collecting espionage data under the disguise of international control to which, it goes without saying, no state taking care of its security can agree.

Instead of real reduction and elimination of armaments the United States proposes to place in stores located on the own territories of states, certain amounts of armaments under the supervision of international controllers. But is it not clear to everybody that a state which would wish to use these weapons for aggressive purposes, could at any time remove the controllers, take the weapons from the stores and put them to action?

Nor is of any practical importance for settling the problem of banning nuclear weapons the proposal to stop the production of fissionable materials for military purposes. It is known to everybody that so many supplies of atomic and hydrogen weapons have been accumulated by now that they are sufficient for destroying whole states. Therefore the implementation of this measure would in no way remove the threat of unleashing a new war by the aggressor, particularly if one takes into account that it is easy to hide the nuclear weapons and nuclear materials produced even if an attempt were made to disclose them.[71]

As to measures for disarmament which are provided for for the second and third stages of the disarmament program, the American plan is so prepared that their implementation will be out of question at all, since no concrete terms of their realization are indicated, while transition from the first stage of disarmament to the second and third ones is made dependant on the fulfilment of a number of additional conditions.

Thus, it is becoming absolutely clear that these so called new American proposals do not pursue objectives of real disarmament, and for that reason, they could not, using your words, "bring new life into the negotiations." Taking into account the experience of many years of negotiations on disarmament and contents of the American proposals in question we can state with all ground that these proposals represent another attempt to deceive the world public opinion and to make it easier for the partisans of the armaments race to continue the accumulation of armaments with all dangerous consequences to follow.

In your message you refer to the statement of the Canadian representative in the Ten Nation Committee of June 24, 1960 when, according to your words, the Canadian delegation put forward detailed suggestions designed to bring the Ten Nations Committee "to grips with the task of real negotiations."[72] Thus you admit yourself that up to June 24 the Ten Nation Committee was not engaged in real negotiations on disarmament. But this was the very reason for which the Soviet Union interrupted its participation in the work of the Ten Nation Committee and suggested that the discussion of the whole subject of disarmament and the situation obtained in the Ten Nation Committee should be transferred to the next session of the U.N. General Assembly. As to the suggestions put forward by the Canadian representative he himself stated in the Committee that they only dealt with the method of conducting negotiations, that is, in other words, they are of procedure nature. Instead of proceeding with concrete discussion of the new Soviet proposals the Canadian representative in the Ten Nation Committee spoke in very dim terms on the subject of "balanced concessions,"[73] thus diverting the Committee still further from practical negotiations on the substance of the new Soviet plan. For one can not replace real negotiations on disarmament with an endless discussion on methods of conducting them.

The Soviet Government, which in the course of the whole work of the Ten Nation Committee has been patiently and persistently striving to conduct real negotiations on disarmament, was forced to state that the Western powers do not want serious negotiations, but try to use the Committee for deceiving the peoples. Under these conditions the work of the Ten Nation Committee could not be continued. Taking this into account the Soviet Government being forced under such circumstances to interrupt its participation in the work of the Committee, moved forward a proposal to discuss at the next session of the U.N. General Assembly the question of disarmament and of the situation which was obtained with regard to the implementation of the U.N. General Assembly resolution of November 20, 1959 on this matter. Apparently at the same time the question will arise of the composition of the Committee and of bringing into the negotiations, in the interests of the work, other states besides those represented in the Ten Nation Committee.

The Soviet Government expresses its conviction that the discussion of the disarmament question at the coming session of the U.N. General Assembly, that is at the forum that has passed the resolution on general and complete disarmaments, will facilitate the positive solution of the problem of disarmament.

The Soviet Government continues to attach a paramount importance to the problem of disarmament and will do its best to achieve a positive solution of this problem. I should like to believe that Canada which should be interested in achieving an agreement on disarmament no less than the Soviet Union, will make a real contribution to the settlement of this urgent problem.

Respectfully,
N. KHRUSHCHEV

DISARMAMENT

Following is text of letter dated July 25 from Canadian Permanent Representative to Chairman of the UN Disarmament Commission.

I have the honour, on instructions from the Canadian Government, to express the following views in support of an early meeting of the UN Disarmament Commission.

In light of the importance which my government attaches to the pursuit of disarmament negotiations, it was profoundly distressed when the work of the Ten-Nation Disarmament Committee was unexpectedly suspended at a moment when the two sides seemed to be moving toward one another. Having in mind Assembly Resolutions 1378 (XIV) of November 20, 1959 and 1403 (XIV) of November 21, 1959 and the Security Council Resolution of May 27, 1960 and consistent with Canada's full recognition of the primary responsibility of the UN in the disarmament field, Canada is firmly of the opinion that the Disarmament Commission should convene.

It is my understanding that a formal request for an early meeting of the commission has already been sent to you.[74] I simply wish, on behalf of the Canadian Government, to assure you of our earnest hope that the Commission will be able to give a much needed stimulus to negotiations which are far too important to be allowed to falter at this time.

As the body exercising the responsibilities of the UN in this field, it is appropriate and desirable that the Commission be fully apprised of the present delay in negotiations in order that it may have the opportunity of expressing itself on the procedural situation and of exercising its influence in favour of the earliest possible resolution of the Geneva talks.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

DISARMAMENT: U.N. DISARMAMENT COMMISSION MEETING

Please reply to Nervo's letter and say that the Canadian Government supports the proposal for a meeting of the Disarmament Commission on August 15, as indeed was suggested in the letter of July 25 to Nervo.

2. As to the second point in Nervo's letter, please state that the name of the Canadian representative to the meeting will be communicated separately.[75]

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

I called on Padilla Nervo this afternoon. He informed us that he had decided to call a meeting of the Disarmament Commission for the afternoon of August 16th and that he will address a letter to this effect to the Secretary-General tonight. He said that he had already received either by letter or orally 40 affirmative responses to his letter and that there were in addition several delegates which had indicated that while they would prefer a later date they would not repeat not oppose a meeting at this time if this was the majority wish. Padilla declined to express a firm opinion whether or not repeat not the Soviet bloc would attend the meeting, but thought it would be against their own interests not repeat not to under the circumstances.

2. Padilla said that during his consultations he had raised the question of the type of debate that should take place at the meeting and had found that the majority of those who were in favour of a meeting considered that the Commission should not repeat not address itself to the question of blame for the failure of the Ten Power negotiations but should concentrate on resumption of negotiations, leaving to the powers concerned the question of how and when the negotiations should be renewed. The majority also considered that the Commission should not repeat not take any decision concerning the relative merits of the Eastern and Western disarmament plans, discussion of which should be left aside until the UNGA.

3. With a view to channelling the discussion along these lines consideration was being given to the presentation at an early stage by a large number of sponsors not repeat not represented on the Ten-Nation Committee of a resolution which would take note of the negotiations in Geneva and of the declarations of Heads of Governments to the effect that they continued to be in favour of the objective of disarmament, would transmit the records of the 10-Nation Committee to the UNGA and would request the powers concerned to renew their negotiations in whatever way they thought appropriate.

4. We are sending in a separate telegram† the text of a draft resolution along these lines which we understand from Australian sources has been shown to the State Department by UAR. According to Australian Embassy in Washington this draft is acceptable to the State Department.

MEETING OF THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION: INSTRUCTIONS

The following are the instructions for the Canadian delegation to the Disarmament Commission. These are being sent to you now because the arguments may be useful to you in consultations within the Five and in discussions with other delegations, particularly the uncommitted group.

2. First, so far as the Canadian authorities are concerned, the sole purpose of a meeting is to encourage a resumption of negotiations, and this means avoiding condemnation recriminations and propaganda.

3. You have received comments on the U.S. draft resolution (our telegram V-510 of August 2).† This draft is sufficiently low-keyed to be a useful demonstration that the West's purpose is not to make propaganda, as the Soviets are encouraging the uncommitted to fear. It might therefore be useful if the Five agreed to show their text before the meeting to a few key neutrals, starting perhaps with the Swedes. There would be no particular virtue in having a Western resolution as such. A resolution sponsored by the uncommitted states would be more satisfactory, in the Canadian view, so long as it made the main point about the importance of resuming negotiations. Perhaps through advance consultation with the Five, the leading uncommitted delegations could produce an agreed draft resolution which they could put forward and which the West would support.

4. Second, as to the question of the composition of the negotiating body, the Canadian view is that, since the negotiations need never have been interrupted in the first place, therefore, when they are resumed, the resumption should take place in the Ten Nation Committee. This would be our first position. We hope it will be unnecessary to go farther in the Disarmament Commission. For your own private information, and for the information of the Five if the question is raised again, the line of our thinking about possible changes in the composition of the negotiating body has been to prefer the least possible change. Thus, if changes have to be accepted, our preference would be for the Ten Nation Committee with the addition of a neutral chairman possibly nominated by the Secretary-General.

5. This arrangement would produce more orderly procedures in the Ten Nation Committee which would facilitate the process of negotiation. At the same time, the "sides" concept would be preserved. One of the most important advantages of the composition of the Ten Nation Committee is that it permits the two most important military blocs in the world to confront each other, and to make a start on developing patterns for disarmament. We do not believe that the process of negotiation in this sense would be made easier by the introduction of a neutral element into the composition of the negotiating body, which would then constitute a completely different approach to the question of how best to negotiate disarmament from the one implied by the composition of the Ten Nation Committee.

6. Third, as to the substance of the disarmament question, a commission of all the members of the United Nations is obviously not suitable for negotiation. Furthermore, we doubt if the uncommitted delegations will wish to speak in favour either of the United States or Soviet plans, which we do not imagine they will have studied in any detail. If they have compromises or additional suggestions to propose, they will probably prefer to save these for the Assembly. Therefore, substance in our view is unlikely to be touched on except by way of illustration. So far as we are concerned, we will refer to the proceedings of the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee only for the purpose of indicating that progress had in fact been made and that there was no valid reason arising out of the negotiations in the Ten Nation Committee for interrupting its proceedings.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION MEETING

The following is the text of a draft resolution submitted by Ecuador, India, Mexico, Sweden, UAR and Yugoslavia: Text Begins:

RECALLING resolution of September 10, 1959, noting with regret that these negotiations have not repeat not yielded positive results,

REAFFIRMING the continuing and ultimate responsibility of the UN in the field of disarmament,

TAKING INTO ACCOUNT Resolution 1378 (XIV) adopted unanimously by the General Assembly on November 20, 1959,

(1) RECOMMENDS to the 15th Session of the General Assembly to give earnest consideration to the question of disarmament.

(2) CONSIDERS it necessary, in view of the urgency of the problem, that continued efforts be made to achieve a constructive solution of the question of general and complete disarmament under effective international control.

(3) RECOMMENDS to the General Assembly that the Disarmament Commission as set up in General Assembly Resolution 1252 (XIII) should continue in being and be convened whenever necessary. Ends.

2. The following is the text of the proposed amendments to the Five Power draft resolution: Text Begins:

(1) Substitute the following for the second paragraph of the preamble: "noting with regret that these negotiations have not repeat not as yet yielded sufficiently positive results,"

(2) Renumber the second operative paragraph as number 1 and substitute the words "the negotiations be resumed at once" for the words "continued efforts be made."

(3) Renumber the first operative paragraph as number 2 and substitute the following:

"2. Recommends in addition that the Fifteenth Session of the General Assembly give earnest consideration to the question of disarmament." Ends.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

On August 17 we met with the representatives of the Six Powers co-sponsoring the draft resolution, contained in our telegram 1212 August 17, which has now been distributed as document DC/180. The purpose of the meeting was to try to work out a text acceptable to the Six and ourselves. Indians had taken the initiative in arranging the meeting.

2. The Minister expressed his misgivings about the Six-Power text. He emphasized that the situation arising out of the interruption of the work of the Ten Nation Committee was serious and that it was up to the Disarmament Commission to express concern and specifically to issue a clear call for the resumption of negotiations. All six representatives agreed about the seriousness of the situation but Jha, who took the lead in the discussion, pointed out that the Six-Power text was based on two main considerations: (a) that the UNGA would meet soon to discuss disarmament fully and (b) that the Six wished to avoid casting reflection on either side in the Ten Power negotiations. As well, they wished to keep the Assembly role open especially since there might be a question of reconstituting a negotiating body. However, it was not repeat not their purpose to bar negotiations either before or during the Assembly; this was the intent of their second operative paragraph.

3. The Minister underlined the need to bring USA and USSR together again and that the non-nuclear powers must give a lead. Nothing would be accomplished if the Commission did not repeat not express itself clearly on the subject of resuming negotiations. The Six Power operative paragraphs would be interpreted mostly as a mere reference of the whole problem to the Assembly. He also explained in rather specific terms the kind of improvement which we thought the text needed.

4. The discussion was about three points: (a) the reversing of the order of the operative paragraphs 1 and 2; (b) the strengthening of paragraph 2 by adding a reference to "negotiations;" and (c) by amending the second preambular paragraph to read "have not repeat not as yet yielded sufficiently positive results." The Six were disposed to strengthen the second operative paragraph after "necessary" by inserting "keeping in mind the urgency of the problem that continued efforts be made with a view to further negotiations to achieve etc..." agreement could not repeat not be reached, however, on a rewording of the second preambular paragraph. The Six were prepared to try to persuade USSR to reverse the order of the two operative paragraphs.

5. Later they reported (a) that USSR would accept the rewording of the second operative paragraph but not repeat not the reversing of the order. It seemed as well that USSR would take "expected" rather than "positive" in the second preambular paragraph. However, the condition for all this was to add "at the highest level" to the first operative paragraph which tended to offset any of the advantages gained.

6. We then met with the Western Four to report on our discussions with the six co-sponsors. We also discussed our proposed amendments. The Four were unanimously agreed that the texts offered by the Six were unacceptable and that Canadian amendments were greatly preferred. Eventually it was agreed that we should proceed with the amendments with the deletion of the word "the" for negotiations in the second amendment. In the evening, however, when it became known that we were preparing to submit the amendment, the six co-sponsors became involved in consultations with USA and UK about a further strengthening of the Six Power text. USSR is being consulted at each stage by the Six, whose main aim is to arrive at a draft resolution acceptable to both sides. This manoeuvring may continue tomorrow but it seems unlikely to produce satisfactory results. In any case we are prepared to submit the draft amendments at this morning's session of the Commission. Unless more speakers come forward, the proceedings could be completed by this afternoon, although the efforts to evolve a compromise text could delay matters.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

Although late last evening additional efforts were made to strengthen the Six-Power text, agreement could not repeat not be reached on a formulation acceptable to East and West. Accordingly, the Minister decided to submit the Canadian amendment which has been transmitted to you. This was done with concurrence with the Western Four whom we met before the meeting. The six co-sponsors were considerably agitated by this move and they have set about revising their own text. The revision has been submitted to the Secretariat and will no repeat no doubt involve additional consultation and manoeuvring. If the revision does not repeat not represent a sufficient improvement in the Six-Power draft resolution, there may be some need to submit a revised amendment.

2. The Minister formally introduced the draft amendment (DC/181) with a brief statement explaining Canadian reasons for doing so.[76] The text is contained in a separate telegram.†

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION — 70TH MEETING

At this afternoons meeting the representative of Ecuador introduced revised version of the Six Power resolution, the text of which is given in our telegram 1237.† Speaking after the representative of Ecuador, the Minister noted that the revised version went a long way to meet the reservations expressed in the Canadian amendment to the previous draft but he again emphasized the desirability of reversing the order of operative paragraphs one and two to place the importance of continuing negotiations in its proper perspective. Text of the Minister's statement is given in our telegram 1238.†

2. In introducing the revised Six Power draft resolution the representative of Ecuador said that at this time the main purpose of the Disarmament Commission should be to provide the moral backing for a return to mutual understanding among the Great Powers. While the time did not repeat not appear ripe at the present moment, when there was still a great deal of mistrust among them, he hoped that it would be possible for them to resume negotiations at an early date. In the circumstances the best way of achieving the results desired by members of the Commission would be to adopt a unanimous resolution which would help to "revitalize efforts" towards disarmament.

3. The Pakistani representative stated that his delegation had approved the convening of the Disarmament Commission and believed that it would not repeat not have been proper to have denied any member of the Ten Nation Committee the right to report on the breakdown of negotiations in Geneva. He said that the difficulties there had been caused as much by mistrust among the Great Powers as by differences in their position on specific questions of disarmament, and he argued that the Commission would have served a useful purpose if it contributed to the relaxation of this tension. Commenting on the substance of the plans put forward by the two sides, he said that the obvious solution to some of the differences between them was "balanced concessions" by each side to the others views. It would also be important, as Indonesian representative had already pointed out, to seek for agreement on partial measures which could in turn lead to wider agreement. In conclusion he again stressed the urgent need for action on disarmament and appealed to the Great Powers to make a start.

4. The Greek representative said that his delegation thought the work of the UNGA would be facilitated by an examination of disarmament questions in the Commission. He did not repeat not agree with other speakers who had said that the Commission should not repeat not deal with matters of substance, and he then went on to outline Greek views on several principles which they considered as prerequisites to successful disarmament negotiations. Although they would have preferred a resolution reflecting a substantive discussion in the Commission, they did not repeat not find anything in the revised Six Power draft which was objectionable.

However they agreed with the Canadian view that the importance of a speedy resumption of negotiations should be stressed.

5. The representative of Iraq said that he thought it would have been preferable to await the UNGA for a discussion of disarmament. However, he thought that the Commission meeting had been useful in clarifying certain of the problems involved. He hoped that further discussion during the Assembly would assist renewed efforts toward reaching agreement, and he believed that it would be unwise for the Commission to do anything which would prejudice discussions there. Hence he could not repeat not support the Canadian request for a reversal of the operative paragraphs to place an emphasis on the immediate resumption of negotiations.

6. The Indian representative then intervened briefly to appeal to the members of the Commission to give their unanimous approval to the revised Six Power resolution. He said that the resolution might not repeat not be the ideal one, but it was well balanced, based on compromise and the only one which had any chance of receiving unanimous approval. He therefore expressed the hope that the Canadian delegation would not repeat not press their request for a reversal of operative paragraphs one and two. The Mexican representative also spoke very briefly in this sense after the conclusion of the Indian representative's statement.

7. The Swedish representative regretted the decision of the Eastern delegations to break off the Geneva talks, but she said that members should not repeat not allow themselves to be discouraged. Although the broader aspects of disarmament were the concern of all states (including the People's Republic of China) she believed that discussions of disarmament should be continued in a small negotiating group and that technical discussions at a working level would be desirable. In concluding her statement she appealed to all members of the Commission to vote in favour of the revised Six Power resolution.

8. The delegate of Ceylon said that they believed the UN must exercise every possible influence in promoting disarmament, since the subject was not repeat not one which was the exclusive concern of the Great Powers. He suggested that on way of breaking the existing deadlock might be for a group of nations not repeat not closely associated with either Great Power to work out as a first step the broad areas of agreement on disarmament questions. Their conclusions might then be discussed by the Ten Nation Committee and through it, by the Disarmament Commission.

9. The representative of Ceylon having been the last speaker in the Debate, the representative of Ecuador intervened briefly before the vote on the draft resolution to suggest a further compromise. He argued that in the minds of the sponsors the numbering of the operative paragraphs had not repeat not been intended to assign special priorities or emphasize the importance of the work of the General Assembly as against that of renewed negotiations. In order to make this point clear to all delegations he suggested that the operative paragraphs should not repeat not be numbered, a compromise which he understood was satisfactory to Canada. The Minister intervened to say that this suggestion was acceptable to the Canadian delegation.

10. Nervo then said that he assumed there were now no repeat no objections to the draft Six Power resolution and that unless there were any delegations who wished to express themselves to the contrary he would take it that the resolution was adopted unanimously. No repeat no objections were raised.

11. After the vote, Lodge spoke briefly to say that USA delegation had asked for the Commission to be called in order to stress the urgency of disarmament negotiations, and they had been more than satisfied with what had been accomplished during the meetings. He was followed by the representative of USSR who said that he had voted for the resolution because it called for serious consideration to be given to the question of disarmament at the General Assembly, and because it again recommended that there should be renewed efforts to achieve general and complete disarmament. At the same time, he noted that there had been no repeat no mention in the resolution of the participation of Heads of Government at the UNGA, and he expressed the hope that delegations would approach the question of disarmament at the forthcoming session with all seriousness and that they would be represented there by the Heads of their governments.

12. Nervo concluded the meeting with an expression of satisfaction that delegations had recognized the need for continued negotiations and that a resolution stating this fact had been unanimously adopted.[77]

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION
TO THE FIFTEENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The fifteenth regular session of the United Nations General Assembly opens on September 20 with an agenda of some 85 items. This memorandum contains suggested lines of policy to be followed by the Canadian Delegation, with particular reference to a number of the more specific questions likely to arise. In accordance with past practice, supplementary instructions will be sent to the Delegation on special issues encountered during the session.

2. Recent months have seen not only a serious deterioration in international relations, but also a disturbing resort to extreme language, irritability and rocket rattling on the part of some countries. This tendency towards increasing tension is expected to colour the work of the Assembly and, of course, presents a grave challenge to the prestige and authority of the United Nations. It is now, perhaps more than ever before, imperative to recall the high purposes and principles of the organization. It is especially desirable for the Canadian Delegation to stress Canada's strong support for the United Nations and the continued conviction of the Canadian Government that despite its defects and limitations the organization has an indispensable role to play in maintaining peace. The Delegation should, moreover, be alert to seize every opportunity that may be presented to encourage an improvement in the conduct of relations between Eastern and Western countries and to promote understanding between the latter and the countries of Asia and Africa. In regard to the usual quota of Eastern-inspired propaganda items, the Delegation should work for resolutions calling for the peaceful settlement of international disputes and practical progress towards the economic and social well-being of the member countries.

Disarmament

3. Canada continues to regard disarmament as the most important issue facing the world. Because it affects the interests of all nations and because the Charter makes provision for it, Canadian policy has constantly maintained the ultimate responsibility of the United Nations in the disarmament field. However, at this juncture the hard fact is that no meaningful steps towards agreement on disarmament under effective international control can be achieved except in serious negotiation between the representatives of the two great military alignments.

4. Although we share the disappointment that the negotiations called for in General Assembly Resolution 1378 (XIV) have been interrupted, we remain convinced that negotiations between the two sides offer the only real hope of achieving solid agreement. The progress made in Geneva, while much less than world opinion hoped for, nevertheless justifies faith in the potential value of the Ten Nation Committee. In present circumstances a multilateral group or a subcommittee under United Nations auspices would not be as effective a negotiating body. The Delegation, therefore, should work for the earliest possible resumption of negotiations in the Ten Nation Committee.

5. Accordingly, the Canadian Delegation should as well seek to neutralize the expected initiative of the uncommitted countries and the Soviet bloc in favour of a new negotiating forum. This might be accomplished by suggesting in response to any substantial support for a new United Nations body that the United Nations be given the task of studying specific technical problems within the disarmament field to facilitate the political negotiations in the Ten Nation Committee. This would involve the establishment of a sub-committee or sub-committees of technical experts under the aegis of the United Nations Disarmament Commission who would conduct studies and make recommendations to the ten negotiating countries. If it should become clear that the USSR refuse to continue in the Ten Nation Committee, a broad measure of support for the creation of a new negotiating forum within the United Nations may develop. Should the majority favour this course the Delegation may acquiesce on the grounds that in the circumstances there seems to be no other way of dealing with the urgent problem of disarmament.

6. In whatever direction the discussion may lead, the Delegation should maintain a vigilant defence of the principles of effective international control; of a balanced, phased programme; and that no state or group of countries will be put at a military disadvantage by reason of adherence to a disarmament programme or implementation of a disarmament measure.

7. With regard to the Irish item concerning the wider dissemination of nuclear weapons, the Delegation should base its substantive position on the fact that the Canadian Government has no intention of lowering its defensive guard pending the promise of satisfactory progress towards disarmament. The ultimate tactical position adopted in regard to specific proposals in this area will depend on the text of the proposals and on the extent to which they can be regarded as procedural.

8. Proposals relating to nuclear test explosions should be approached in the light of the Government's clear position of opposition to their resumption.

Elections to Assembly Offices

9. Canada has indicated its support for Mr. Boland of Ireland as President of the session, and is itself seeking election for one of the vice-presidencies. In respect of the other elective offices, the Delegation will be guided by the relevant provisions of the Charter respecting the equitable sharing of positions on a geographic basis and the wishes of countries with specially close ties with Canada.

Elections to the Security Council

10. The Governments of Chile, Portugal and the United Arab Republic have been informed of Canadian support for their candidatures. In addition to voting for these countries, the Delegation should support Turkey in the formality of electing that country to replace Poland, which will be resigning its seat in accordance with the compromise arrangement reached at the fourteenth session. The Delegation may depart from its position as regards Portugal should that country's candidature give rise to unforseen developments of a significant character.

Elections to the Economic and Social Council

11. Seven candidates have emerged for the six seats coming up for election to ECOSOC: China, France, El Salvador, Uruguay, Belgium, Ethiopia and Jordan. No difficulty is expected in the re-election of France or the election of the agreed candidates for the Latin American seats. Some opposition may develop to China's re-election but it is expected that the Great Power convention in these elections will be maintained. Belgium may run into heavy opposition because of developments in the Congo and an effort may be made to displace it by the unsuccessful candidate for the Sudan seat (either Ethiopia or Jordan). There is no reason, however, for Canada to modify its support for Belgium. The Ghana candidature which Canada had decided to support has been withdrawn and no assessment of the relative strength of the remaining candidates, Ethiopia and Jordan, has yet been possible. The Canadian Delegation should support China, France, El Salvador, Uruguay and Belgium, and exercise its discretion in voting for whichever candidate for the Sudan seat (Ethiopia or Jordan) it appears will be more acceptable to the Assembly.

Chinese Representation

12. The attempt to unseat the Nationalist Chinese Delegation in favour of one representing the Communist Government on the mainland has been made at every General Assembly session since 1950. This year the Soviet Union has submitted the relevant item instead of India, which in existing circumstances is apparently not disposed to offer this degree of support to the Peking régime. The Delegation should vote in favour of the usual "moratorium" resolution postponing consideration of this matter for a fixed period of time. It should also vote to accept the credentials of the Delegation of the Republic of China if they are challenged.

Tibet

13. In 1959 the Canadian Delegation worked for and supported a resolution condemning Chinese Communist action in Tibet on the basis of a violation of human rights. In order to avoid a situation in which most of Communist China's neighbours would oppose any resolution and thus in effect endorse her actions, it was considered that the resolution should be moderate, emphasize human rights and avoid political judgments about the international status of Tibet. The Delegation should maintain this attitude at the forthcoming session.

Hungary

14. It is likely that the debate on Hungary will concentrate more than in 1959 on the general theme of the Soviet Union's failure to respect United Nations resolutions, especially as, in contrast to last year, there is no specific new evidence of repression to illustrate the West's concern with the Hungarian situation. It may be also that in the expected tense atmosphere at the Assembly the Hungarian debate will become an occasion for general Western condemnation of Soviet policies. The Canadian Delegation should support a Western resolution on Hungary which is cast in terms similar to those used at the last session and which provides for the continuation of United Nations' interest in the Hungarian situation.

Hungarian Credentials

15. It is expected that, as at all General Assembly sessions since 1956, a proposal will be made to take no decision as to the acceptability of the credentials of the Hungarian Delegation. This move is intended to reflect the reservations many member nations have about the legitimacy of the Kadar government, although it does not inhibit the Hungarian representatives from participating in debates and voting on Assembly resolutions. Once again the Delegation should support the "no decision" formula.

Algeria

16. Indications are that the debate on Algeria will be more difficult than it was at the fourteenth session. African members in increased numbers will be in full cry, especially since General de Gaulle has already taken the position that he will pay no heed to any resolution adopted by the General Assembly. The friends of France will no doubt find themselves in an extremely difficult position unless some progress is made outside the United Nations toward bringing the parties together. While this could not be described as a likelihood, it is nevertheless a reasonable possibility. However, the tactics to be employed by the French at the General Assembly are still unknown. In the light of the yet unknown factors bearing fundamentally on the Canadian attitude at the General Assembly, it is not yet possible to lay down specific policy guidance. Accordingly, before taking a position the Delegation should seek instructions when the situation has clarified.

Austrian Minority in Italy

17. Austria has formally proposed inscription of this item concerning the German-speaking minority in the South Tyrol. The Italians have indicated that they will oppose introduction of the dispute to the United Nations, favouring instead a direct reference to the International Court. Since we are not directly concerned in the merits of the dispute, a decision regarding the course we should follow in voting on inscription of the item presents some difficulties, as both disputants are friendly to Canada.

18. Traditionally, with a few rare exceptions, Canadian policy has followed a fairly liberal course as to inscription, based on the distinction between the right of the General Assembly to discuss a problem and its competence to render a decision. Accordingly, the Delegation should vote in favour of inscription, withholding judgment as to whether the dispute is appropriate for decision within the terms of the Charter pending a clearer exposition by the two parties of the substance of the dispute.

The Congo

19. Events have been moving so rapidly that it is very difficult to estimate how the Congo problem may affect the Assembly session. At the moment there is no agenda item providing specifically for a discussion of the political aspects. However, the question of financing the United Nations Operation in the Congo (ONUC) and the even more critical problem of establishing the economic viability of the new state are matters which will sooner or later need to be faced. In the event of any discussion taking place on the Congo operation, it is recommended that the Delegation emphasize that it is essential for all member states of the United Nations to provide the broadest possible measure of material support for the United Nations Operation and for the Republic of Congo itself; and that it is in the interests of all to contribute to the reduction of regional or international tensions and to maintain the influence of the United Nations.

UNEF

20. A separate submission to Cabinet on the UNEF rebate question has been presented. When a policy decision has been made, instructions for the Delegation can be formulated on UNEF financing.

Aid to Economic Development

21. Cabinet has received for consideration a submission proposing Canadian aid to Commonwealth countries in Africa. Further submissions on economic development projects are in preparation. Decisions taken on these proposals will be incorporated in the Delegation's instructions.

Human Rights

22. The agenda for the Third Committee is brief but heavy. It comprises three texts, which the underdeveloped countries and a number of other countries regard as of fundamental importance, namely the Draft International Covenants on Human Rights, the Draft Convention and Draft Declaration on Freedom of Information and the Draft Declaration on the Right of Asylum. Of these three texts, it is expected that the priority will be given to the Draft International Covenants on Human Rights which were first introduced before the General Assembly for final drafting and adoption in 1954. Despite the great number of meetings which were devoted to this question in the Third Committee, little progress was achieved and the magnitude of the work still to be done is recognized. Canadian participation in the drafting work of the Third Committee has, so far, been without prejudice to the constitutional competence of the provinces and was based on the hope that a satisfactory federal clause be eventually included in the Covenants. It is uncertain whether the Covenants will ever reach the treaty stage. If they do, it is expected that they will assume the character of a declaration of principle, a written code of human rights, which will form part of the International Jurisprudence. Discussion on the Covenants will provide the Delegation with an opportunity to reassert, on the international plane, Canada's belief in the fundamental rights, freedom and liberties already encompassed in [the] recent Canadian Bill of Rights.

Contributions to Extra-Budgetary Funds

23. Submissions concerning the Special Fund and EPTA have been made separately, and a separate one on other extra-budgetary contributions is to be submitted. Decisions taken on these items will be incorporated in the instructions.

United States Aggressive Flights over the Soviet Union

24. The Soviet Union has asked for the inclusion of this item on the agenda and will doubtless put forward a draft resolution critical of the United States for permitting the U-2 and RB-47 flights. The United States or one of its allies may put forward a draft resolution calling for an impartial inquiry into the circumstances of the RB-47 incident, and it is possible that some neutral countries will seek acceptance of a draft resolution urging the two sides in the dispute to settle their differences and resume negotiations at a high level. The Canadian Delegation should seek to co-operate with other delegations to make debate on this item as short as possible. It should vote against any draft resolution critical of United States actions, but should consider supporting an appeal for an impartial inquiry into the RB-47 incident and a neutrally sponsored draft resolution calling for resumed negotiations. The Delegation should consider whether at any time during the debate there would be advantage in drawing attention to the recent unauthorized overflight of Canadian territory by a Soviet aircraft.

Apartheid

25. It is impossible to say as yet whether the resolution proposed this year will be a tough one, resulting from the pressure of opinion in the many prospective new African member states, or a mild one similar to those of former years, which have obtained wide support. Canada is strongly opposed to the principle of apartheid. However, the possible international repercussions of a United Nations resolution of a harsh or punitive nature give rise to concern. Accordingly, if a vote is called on inscription of the item, the Delegation should vote in favour. The Delegation should not support without supplementary instructions any resolution condemnatory in tone or punitive in application. The Delegation should make known publicly Canada's abhorrence of racial discrimination. So far as possible the Delegation should seek additional specific instructions before casting any vote.

Treatment of Peoples of Indian or Indo-Pakistan Origin of South Africa

26. Since the issue is basically allied with that of apartheid, the same policy considerations for Canada would apply. The Delegation should: vote in favour of inscription should a vote be taken; vote against any proposal for economic sanctions or expulsion from the United Nations; abstain on any resolution condemning South Africa or any clause implying inclusion of the item on the agenda of a future session; vote in favour of a resolution recalling member states' Charter obligations and appealing generally for a revision of the Union's racial policies; recommend direct negotiations or reference to the International Court.

Southwest Africa

27. It is likely that African states will concentrate pressure on this item to force the Union of South Africa at least to respect the principles and purposes of the League of Nations Mandate and preferably to place the territory under the International Trusteeship System. The Union has recently indicated a willingness to negotiate under certain conditions with an ad hoc body of the United Nations. The Delegation should maintain Canada's opposition to apartheid by voting in favour of hearings of petitioners, or of moderate resolutions regretting the police actions at Windhoek which resulted in loss of life. However, the Delegation should abstain on resolutions recommending reference to the International Court, which would preclude further negotiations.

Admission of New Members

28. In accordance with Article 4 of the Charter the Security Council has recommended the admission of the following new members: Cameroun, Togo, Federation of Mali, Malagasy Republic, Congo, Somalia, Dahomey, Niger, Upper Volta, Ivory Coast, Gabon, Chad, Central African Republic, Republic of Congo, Cyprus. Since the recommendation concerning Mali, Senegal has seceded from the Federation and has applied for United Nations membership in its own name. At present, the other part of the Federation, Soudan, has not applied. The indications are that France will support separate applications but these will require Security Council action. Canada favours the admission of all new members recommended by the Security Council. The Delegation should, therefore, vote for the admission of all the states listed, including the two parts of the Mali Federation, when appropriate action has been taken by the Council. It is understood that Assembly action on the new members will be taken at the opening session of the General Assembly.

Recommendation

29. It is recommended that approval be given for the issuance of instructions to the Canadian Delegation in conformity with the policy lines indicated above.[78]

15TH UNGA: ATTENDANCE BY HEADS OF GOVERNMENT

The press this morning features the announcement that Khrushchev will head USSR delegation to the 15th Session of UNGA. This is linked with the story that President Eisenhower will also attend to deliver a major speech in reply to Khrushchev. Reports from London and Paris indicate that further consideration is being given to whether Heads of Government would attend. It is believed that Soviet Bloc leaders will do so. Castro is described as a "likely joiner."

2. We are wondering what the response will be from the other geographical areas represented in UN. Even before Khrushchev's plans were firm President Nkrumah had indicated his intention of attending UNGA for a short time. It would be interesting to know whether other African-Asian and Latin American Heads of Government have similar intentions. We assume that you will continue to consult with your colleagues about the possibilities.

3. If there should be a wide-spread move on the part of Heads of Government to attend UNGA, it would give USSR a considerable propaganda advantage for having taken the initiative. We could expect as well that USSR would follow this up with further moves designed to maintain the initiative in the field of disarmament. There might be as well an extension of Soviet propaganda attacks on USA which began with U-2 incident. The net effect for UNGA would be a propaganda jamboree in which Western powers might find themselves on the defensive. Accordingly, there might be some advantage in trying to minimize the response to Khrushchev's initiative.

4. Canadian representatives in Washington, London and Paris and Canberra should seek from the appropriate authorities official reaction to Khrushchev move. Prime Minister is most anxious to have an early indication of the intentions of Prime Ministers Macmillan and Menzies. In London, as well, there may be some indication of the reaction of other Commonwealth governments.

POSSIBLE ATTENDANCE OF PRIME MINISTER AT UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

10. The Prime Minister said he had received a message from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom about the possibility of Prime Ministers and heads of governments attending the forthcoming session of the General Assembly of the United Nations. Mr. Macmillan had stated that there was much to be said for re-starting the process towards better relations between East and West which he himself had initiated on his visit to Moscow over a year ago. Now that Khrushchev and leaders of the satellite countries were coming to the U.N., Mr. Macmillan considered it would be helpful if at least some heads of Commonwealth countries could be in New York to rebut the crude attacks of the Communists and to deal with several subjects, including disarmament. Mr. Macmillan would be interested to know what Mr. Diefenbaker's plans were. Mr. Macmillan had not yet decided himself whether he would go but in any event his visit would not be in the first few days after Mr. Khrushchev's speech.

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said it was difficult to decide whether the Prime Minister should be present or not. The U.S.S.R.'s stock was not high now in the uncommitted nations of the world because of Soviet behaviour over the hoped-for summit talks in the spring and because they had broken off the discussions on disarmament in Geneva. Probably Khrushchev would put forward a new disarmament proposal in an appeal to the uncommitted. There was no possible chance of a U.N. debate solving the disarmament problem. President Eisenhower would make one speech at the Assembly's session and then return right away to Washington. So far other leaders who had indicated they would be present at the Assembly included Nasser, Tito and Castro. Mr. Nehru was still undecided. He might come later.

Mr. Macmillan apparently felt he had slipped out of the picture since his initiative of eighteen months ago and would now like to get things moving again. Neither Adenauer nor de Gaulle would be in New York. The best Canadian approach was to encourage the nuclear nations to negotiate directly on disarmament.

Macmillan's message suggested a debate on the whole subject of east-west relations. The neutral nations of the world would be annoyed with more talk on this general matter and Canada would not gain friends by supporting such a move. The uncommitted considered that the only way a third world war could be avoided was by the United States and the Soviet Union trying to resolve their difficulties together. Both these big powers were becoming more and more concerned about world opinion, particularly because at this session 15 or 16 new members, all of them so far neutral, were to be admitted to the U.N. As far as the U.S. and its allies were concerned, they would not find it so easy now to get a majority in their favour at the U.N. when they wanted one.

12. During the discussion surprise was expressed at Macmillan's suggestion. Khrushchev was obviously trying to redeem himself after his error on the summit, his attacks on Eisenhower and the Soviet withdrawal from the disarmament talks in Geneva. Now he was trying to arrange a summit in New York. It would be a mistake to follow Macmillan's idea and, in effect, fall in with Khrushchev's plan. On the other hand, it was unwise to reach a decision now. The best course would be to await Khrushchev's speech at the U.N. Canada was scheduled to speak on the Monday of the following week.

13. The Cabinet noted the report and discussion on the suggestion of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom that Commonwealth leaders be present at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly of the United Nations and deferred a decision on whether the Prime Minister should attend until after the speech in the Assembly by Mr. Khrushchev.

ATTENDANCE OF PRIME MINISTER AT UNITED NATIONS SESSION
(Previous reference September 16)

1. The Prime Minister referred to the previous discussion in Cabinet about whether or not he should attend the present session of the United Nations and said that he had received a few moments earlier a message from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Mr. Macmillan would announce during the day his intention of proceeding to New York on the following Sunday, but did not think he would speak before the following Thursday, or Friday.

2. Mr. Green had called to say that he was now definitely of the opinion that the Prime Minister should proceed to New York to address the United Nations. Canada's turn to speak would come up on the following Monday.

He did not wish any announcement about the matter to be made until after Khrushchev had made his speech.

3. During the brief discussion there was almost unanimous agreement that the Prime Minister should proceed to New York the following Monday to address the United Nations. This would present an opportunity to put forward Canada's own views. If the Soviet Premier took an abusive line in his speech, Canada could repeat its offer for the reciprocal inspection of Arctic regions. Should Khrushchev say that Canada was completely dominated by the United States, it could be pointed out to him that there were free elections in Canada which allowed people to say what they wanted and he could be asked why such countries as the Ukraine, Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania were not given the opportunity to vote. Some felt that Canada's interest in international affairs was out of all proportion with the size of its population and its importance in general in the world.

4. The Cabinet agreed that the Prime Minister should proceed to New York to address the United Nations on the following Monday.

Projet d'une note de l'adjoint spécial
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Draft Memorandum by Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], September 29, 1960

En route from Ottawa to New York September 29 the Prime Minister was speculating on the possibility of a casual meeting with Mr. Khrushchev. He said that he had no intention of taking the initiative to meet Mr. Khrushchev but if he could run into him in a corridor he would shake hands with him and perhaps have a short chat. This remark was in the context of the strongly favourable reaction from the Canadian ethnic groups to the Prime Minister's address in the general debate.[79] I believe that the Prime Minister felt that some sort of counter-balance to his anti-Soviet line might not be amiss.

See United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifteenth Session, Plenary Assembly, 871st Meeting, September 22, 1960, pp. 108-12.

On the way into New York I discussed with Ross Campbell the possibility of engineering a casual meeting with Mr. Khrushchev. We could not, however, think of any way in which we could arrange this without giving the appearance of having taken an initiative which would be politically embarrassing to the Prime Minister. Mr. Khrushchev made the situation more difficult during Mr. Macmillan's speech by intervening twice with shouted interjections from his seat on the floor of the Assembly. Although Mr. Macmillan dealt successfully with these interjections, the incident had raised the temperature in the Assembly. Even the satellite delegations, especially the Poles had the appearance of acute embarrassment during the second of Mr. Khrushchev's impromptu contributions.

In these circumstances, I believe that the Prime Minister felt that the atmosphere for even a brief handshake with Mr. Khrushchev was less propitious than it might otherwise have been. Whether or not this is the explanation, an ideal opportunity for a meeting arose immediately after Mr. Macmillan's speech[80] and was deliberately foregone by the Prime Minister. Mr. Khrushchev appeared moving out of a crowd at the head of a triangular phalanx moving, so far as I could tell, deliberately in Mr. Diefenbaker's direction. I drew Mr. Diefenbaker's attention to Mr. Khrushchev's approach but he was preoccupied with a newspaperman and I think did not notice until it was too late even though I passed within three or four feet. A few seconds later Khrushchev turned his convoy round and came back again directly towards Mr. Diefenbaker. I did not look directly at Mr. Diefenbaker but moved this time within touching distance. Mr. Diefenbaker stood as if on the point of moving to greet and then held back. I walked by fully conscious of the pregnancy of the moment.

A few seconds after this incident, the Prime Minister was wondering whether he had made a mistake. He told Mr. Macmillan of the incident on the telephone later when he congratulated Mr. Macmillan on his speech.

Two other points worth noting: (a) Khrushchev's first interjection in translation read "and then you committed aggression" — this in relation to Mr. Macmillan's explanation of the breakdown of the Summit Conference; (b) Khrushchev's second interjection was to the effect that the Soviet Union would accept control to the extent that the West would accept disarmament. He repeated this interjection twice.

One other point which I noticed and thought unfortunate was the opportunity which the PM lost to congratulate Macmillan when he stepped down from the rostrum. It struck me that at a time when Macmillan had just completed an outstandingly successful speech part of which was devoted to Commonwealth affairs and to a recognition of points in Mr. Diefenbaker's own speech, it would have been appropriate (and good fodder for TV) if the Prime Minister, placed strategically below the rostrum, could have risen to congratulate Macmillan. Instead, it was left to the Italian Foreign Minister Segni to make the gesture.

Note d'une conversation du premier ministre avec le président des États-Unis

Memorandum of Conversation of Prime Minister with President of United States

CANADIAN EYES ONLY. SECRET. [Ottawa], October 1, 1960

General

The Prime Minister called on President Eisenhower at his suite in the Waldorf Astoria Hotel at 2.30 p.m. on September 27. Mr. Herter, Mr. Achilles, Counsellor of the State Department, and General Goodpaster of the White House Staff, were with the President. The Prime Minister was accompanied by the Honourable Mr. Green and Mr. H.B. Robinson.

The President and Mr. Herter began by expressing in very warm terms their appreciation of the Prime Minister's speech of September 26 to the United Nations General Assembly. Mr. Herter said that, apart from the Communist representatives, he had heard nothing but approval from other delegations. The Prime Minister said that he understood that Krishna Menon had called the speech "a continuation of the cold war" and Mr. Herter said that Menon could always be counted upon to say something provocative or unpredictable.

In reply to the Prime Minister's enquiry as to what would be the outcome of the General Assembly session, the President said that some people he had talked to in recent days thought that Khrushchev was cooling down. Personally he found it hard to believe. He had been "amazed" by the violence of Khrushchev's speech to the Assembly.[81]

Africa

Two things which had struck the President in all the conversations he had had with foreign representatives were (i) their professed abhorrence of Communism and of all forms of dictatorship and (ii) the (he thought genuine) strength of their support for the United Nations. The President said that this latter was true particularly of Nkrumah, despite the disturbing speech which he had made.[82] At this point there was an exchange between the Prime Minister and Mr. Herter over a public comment which Mr. Herter had made about Nkrumah's speech. The Prime Minister understood that Mr. Herter had described the speech as "a Communist speech" but Mr. Herter intervened to say that he had used the words "leaning towards Communism." He had said this not only because of the content of the speech but because of the elaborate and obtrusive pains which Nkrumah had taken at the end of his speech to be seen and photographed with Khrushchev. When the Prime Minister remarked on Nkrumah's tendency to change the tune of his public statements from one day to the next, the President and Mr. Herter quickly agreed and made it clear that they did not trust Nkrumah.

The President asked the Prime Minister whether he had met Sylvanus Olympio. He described Olympio as "quiet, thoughtful, and the best of the African leaders" that he had met.

The President said that he had been considering what should be done about the recognition of the Republic of Congo. Both Nasser and Nkrumah had contended that in the present confused situation, Lumumba had a better juridical claim to recognition than did Kasavubu. On the other hand, the advice which the President got from the State Department was to the opposite effect. The Prime Minister said his impression was that Kasavubu, as President, had a prior claim to that of Lumumba.

The President went on to say that he had been talking to some of the African leaders about the possibility of organizing some kind of loose "confederation" of African states. Questioned by the Prime Minister, the President said that it need not necessarily be a confederation; it might take the form of an economic union. One of its advantages would be to minimize the need of individual African states to purchase arms. The President said that Olympio had been attracted by the idea and that he had not been discouraged by the reaction of some other Africans. He was not sure, however, about the Crown Prince of Morocco who, like Nkrumah and Nasser, was interested in building up a position of influence for himself.

U.S.-U.S.S.R. Relations

Asked by the Prime Minister what he would do if Khrushchev were to ask for a meeting, the President said that Khrushchev would have to do something practical as a pre-condition, for instance, free the two airmen shot down with the RB-47 and accompany this with a message "burying the past." The situation might be different if there were a United Nations resolution urging him to meet with Khrushchev but the President did not appear to regard this as either a desirable or a likely prospect. The President did not believe that Nasser's suggestion for a Khrushchev-Eisenhower meeting[83] had been concerted with the Soviet Government. More likely it was "purely a bid for personal publicity" on Nasser's part.

The Prime Minister expressed reservations about the wisdom of placing limitations on Khrushchev's movements in the United States. Khrushchev had exploited the resultant situation; his impromptu balcony press conference had been a propaganda triumph which, however, he had very largely nullified by his speech to the General Assembly.

Answering the Prime Minister's point about freedom of movement for Khrushchev, the President said that the U.S. authorities were "genuinely alarmed" at the security problems involved in providing protection for so many high-ranking Communist and other foreign leaders. The police were still seriously worried about the threat to Kadar's life, and new problems had been raised by requests from both Tito and Nasser for permission to travel through the United States.

Apart from the security aspect, the President said that he could not forget the manner in which Khrushchev had withdrawn the invitation to visit the U.S.S.R. He did not, therefore, feel under any strong obligation to facilitate Khrushchev's travelling widely in the United States. Nor was the United States Government under a legal obligation to do so under its agreement with the United Nations.

The Prime Minister acknowledged the difficulty of controlling extreme elements among the different ethnic groups. The intensity of feeling among the Eastern European immigrant population in Canada had been revealed by the spontaneity of their approval for the strong anti-Soviet line he had taken in his speech, particularly in his mention of free elections in the Baltic countries and the Ukraine. The President recalled that in his speech to the Assembly he had himself referred to the idea of a universal plebiscite; he had not been as "specific" as the Prime Minister but they were thinking along similar lines.

Cuba

The Prime Minister asked whether preparation were being made for a full answer to be prepared in refutation of Castro's charges against the United States.[84] Mr. Herter intervened to say that the United States Permanent Representative was today exercising the United States' right of reply and that shortly a document would be circulated giving a full answer to Castro's charges in terms similar to those employed by the United States at the San Jose Conference.

Middle East

In speaking of the Middle East, the President said that he had found Nasser relatively mild on the subject of Israel. Nasser said that he had never made statements about driving the Jews into the Mediterranean; Nasser had admitted that "Israel has become a fact." He had however reiterated the usual Arab complaints on the refugee problem. The President remarked that he had been discussing this problem with Mr. Macmillan earlier in the day and that Macmillan had said that if Israel could be persuaded to take from 200,000 to 300,000 refugees, perhaps the remainder could be resettled in other countries at international expense. The Prime Minister made no direct comment.

Food for Peace

The Prime Minister asked whether the President had got further in his planning of a "Food for Peace" programme which they had discussed in Washington early in June.[85] The President replied in the negative. Mr. Benson was at present abroad looking into this among other questions. The United States would continue to work, as in the past, "in starvation countries" but there was a need for a plan "among the surplus producing countries under the aegis of the United Nations." The President said that he would like to see the United Nations do the distribution of surplus foods. Whatever scheme was agreed, it was important not to disturb the normal commercial markets. The Prime Minister made no comment of substance, but drew attention to the relevant part of his speech to the General Assembly.

AFRICA AND THE U.N.

In light of the brief review of current developments in Africa contained in our letter under reference, some tentative thoughts about the implications for the U.N. suggest themselves.

2. It is of course not difficult to foresee that in the course of the next couple of years we will be facing a new situation in the U.N. due to a change in the balance of membership and a marked increase in demands for U.N. assistance of all kinds. Admission of eight or more new African states into the U.N. will not only bring the proportion of Asian-African members to well over one third of the total membership, it will also bring the number of African members almost up to the number of Asian members. This will mean that the Africans will wield increasing influence over the largest grouping in the U.N. At the same time there are already indications of an incipient split between the Asians on the one hand and the Africans on the other, the former tending to be more responsible and the latter to be more outspoken and extreme. The result may be either formation of a purely African group or some moderation of the more extreme African positions.

3. These changes in U.N. membership may raise serious problems for the Western powers, particularly in the General Assembly. Such changes cannot but affect still further the voting pattern in the Assembly and make it a more unwieldy and, from the Western point of view at least, a less reliable and less responsible organ. Assembly decisions on economic development, on colonial questions and on political problems will undoubtedly be increasingly coloured by the views of the member states with underdeveloped, anti-colonial and neutralist backgrounds. At the same time there may be increasing pressure for expansion of the Councils, or even for some redistribution of the existing membership of the Councils, to reflect better the increased membership of the U.N.

4. The prestige of the U.N. in the eyes of the Western powers, and the degree of their participation in the Organization, may be put into question. They may find themselves on the receiving end of Assembly recommendations on important economic and political questions that are unacceptable to them. This may lead them to downgrade Assembly recommendations (para 5 of our letter under reference refers). They may also try to shift the emphasis from the General Assembly back to other U.N. organs or to bodies outside the U.N., though any attempt to do so would undoubtedly be strongly resisted by the newer members.

5. The U.S.A. Mission are already thinking about some of the political problems that will be posed for them at the next Assembly by the admission of new African members. They feel that it is of considerable importance that these new members should not be allowed to fall immediately under the influence of the more extreme Asian-African states because that could establish their future voting pattern on many of the perennial U.N. issues. They are therefore looking for some issues likely to be on the agenda of the next session on which the new members might be persuaded to vote with the West (i.e. for the existing Western position). They have not yet thought this idea through but examples they have in mind are: the presidency of the General Assembly; the financing of UNEF; and Korea.

6. Apart from whether or not these are good choices, it does seem to us that it is perhaps a less useful exercise to try to enlist the support of the new members for the existing Western position on long-standing issues than to seek some new initiative that is likely to appeal to the new members. It also seems to us that, given the situation in the Asian-African group, it might be of considerable advantage if some of the middle and smaller powers associated with the Western powers but in a position to pursue an independent policy could provide a sort of rallying point for the more moderate Asians and Africans who do not always wish to go along with their group but would not otherwise have anywhere to go. Such a role could conceivably be played by such middle and smaller powers as Canada, Ireland and the Scandinavians. It would be effective, however, only if the Western powers regarded it neither as a conspiracy against them nor as something to be appropriated by them. In fact, of course, the beginnings of such a "middle group" were seen at the last session of the General Assembly and Canada played a not inconsiderable part in it.

7. Some practical problems of Assembly operation can also be foreseen. The present pattern of committee and plenary debate was never designed for the size of Assembly we have even now; and problems of accommodation and procedure are soon going to be pressing. They will have to be speedily solved if the Assembly is to get through its annual work. One idea that has occurred to us is to reduce the size of the main committees, or at least the non-political ones (i.e. Committees II to VI).

8. As to the position of the new African members in the U.N., there may be some similarities between the present period in Africa and the period of upheaval in Asia in the years following the Second World War. In both cases the tide of nationalism and anti-colonialism was running strong and gave a superficial unity of political outlook and expression to the whole continent. In time, however, the exuberance of that expression waned, the unity of outlook receded and the latent differences came to the surface in Asia as independence was achieved and the problems of consolidation had to be faced. In Africa it will not be so very long now before the anti-colonialists are pushing on an open door. It may still be some time before we reach the high water mark of nationalism there, but when we do, it would not be surprising to find that the latent differences and rivalries among the new states in Africa that then come to the surface are even more marked than those that have appeared in Asia. For one thing the international boundaries that separate the emerging states in Africa are nothing but accidents of political history, without any roots in racial, geographic or economic factors, and the temptation to change them, either for economic viability or political aggrandizement, may be great.

9. In this respect the developing situation in Africa suggests a certain parallel with the situation that has existed in the Middle East in recent years. The boundaries that were drawn there after the First World War had little more foundation than those in Africa today, and intra-Arab rivalries have been a perennial source of international tension for many years. If a similar pattern develops in Africa we may be in for a series of conflicts among the new states that could result in a large and prolonged U.N. peace-keeping operation in order to avoid direct Great Power involvement.

10. Such developments in Africa are likely to give a new dimension to the "cold war," in which the West may suffer somewhat from its close association with South Africa and with French policy in North Africa, but should have a number of natural advantages over the Soviet bloc. Situations are developing and will continue to develop in Africa which must complicate the Communists' approach and pose difficult problems for them. So long as the main question is the early attainment of independence and the ending of "colonial rule" the Communist line can be relatively simple and pays off well. With the complex power relation and rivalries that may grow up among the independent African states, the Communists will be faced with delicate decisions and choices between interests and nations on the African Continent which may be much more risky for them than the simple emphasis on early independence and simple blame for all ills on the colonial powers which have been such an easy and effective line until now.

IRISH RESOLUTION AGAINST THE DISSEMINATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

United Nations General Assembly Resolution 1380 (XIV) requested the Ten-Nation Disarmament Committee to study "the possibility of an international agreement, whereby the powers producing nuclear weapons would refrain from handing over the control of such weapons to a nation not possessing them, and whereby the powers not possessing such weapons would refrain from manufacturing them." Canada voted for this procedural resolution.

The Ten-Nation Disarmament Committee did not make this study. However, the June 2, 1960 U.S.S.R. disarmament plan provides that "States having nuclear weapons at their disposal shall undertake not to transfer such weapons or information necessary for manufacture thereof to states which do not possess such weapons. At the same time states possessing no nuclear weapons shall undertake to refrain from manufacturing such weapons."

It will be noted that the expression "transfer" is used instead of "handling over the control." This is significant. The former expression would allow the existing state of affairs, under which, while there are atomic carriers in the United Kingdom, Italy and Turkey, the United States retains the control of the nuclear warheads. It might also allow the extension of such a system. The use of the expression "transfer" would probably be interpreted so as to exclude the presence of nuclear weapons on the territory of any nation which had not manufactured them.

Ireland has proposed the prevention of the dissemination of nuclear weapons for the agenda of the forthcoming General Assembly. It seems likely that it will be very seriously debated. Canada is unlikely to be able to avoid taking a position on the principle of the resolution by voting for a procedural resolution, as we did in 1959. It therefore seems necessary to take a decision as to the policy which should guide our delegation in the discussion of and voting upon the expected resolution.

The policy to be adopted will, of course, affect the policy and commitments of Canada as regards armaments to be acquired in connection with our responsibilities in NATO and for the defence of North America.

Recommendation

1. Canada should support and vote for a resolution calling for the prevention, under effective international control, of the further dissemination of nuclear weapons, as such prevention would facilitate eventual general and complete disarmament and reduce likelihood of the outbreak of nuclear warfare.

2. Should unqualified support of the principle of the prevention of dissemination of nuclear weapons be impossible in view of Canada's present commitments in respect of the provision of nuclear armaments for Canadian forces in NATO and for defence of the North American continent, we should support a resolution in the same terms as the Resolution 1380 (XIV). While this would not necessarily stop the dissemination of nuclear armaments on both sides, it would at least create some restriction.

3. If Canada did not support or vote for a resolution against the dissemination of nuclear armaments, our sincerity in advocating the abolition of nuclear weapons and carriers would be questioned by the Communist bloc and non-committed countries.

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Defence Liaison (1) Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], September 14, 1960

Reference: United Nations Division memorandum to you of Sept. 12† and General Burns' memorandum to the Minister of Sept. 12.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY: IRISH RESOLUTION AGAINST THE DISSEMINATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

General Burns' memorandum raises a number of points which I feel should be brought to your attention since he refers to our present commitments in respect of the provision of nuclear armaments for Canadian forces in NATO and for the defence of North America.

2. The government has, as you know, publicly announced its intention to equip our armed forces with certain items of hardware (BOMARC and Honest John) which achieve their full potential only when equipped with nuclear warheads. In addition, the Air Division assigned to NATO will be re-equipped with CF-104s which will, we understand, contain special equipment designed for the employment of nuclear air to ground weapons. This does not, however, mean the aircraft will be exclusively "nuclear carriers," but rather that they will have a dual capacity.

3. On the other hand, there has so far been no decision whether or not to give Canadian forces either in Canada or in Europe a nuclear capability. All that has been said publicly is along the line that the government is "examining with the United States questions connected with the acquisition of warheads for BOMARC and other defensive weapons for use by the Canadian forces in Canada. ... Problems connected with the arming of the Canadian Brigade in Europe and short-range nuclear weapons for NATO's defence tasks are also being studied," (Feb. 20/59)[86] and that "negotiations are proceeding with the United States in order that the necessary weapons can be made available for Canadian defence units if and when they are required." (Jan. 18/60).[87] The government has also said publicly that "it is our intention to provide Canadian forces with modern and efficient weapons to enable them to fulfil their respective roles. ... We must reluctantly admit the need in present circumstances for nuclear weapons of a defensive character." (Feb. 20/59).

4. With this as a background, the first question which General Burns' memorandum gives rise to is what is meant by the phrase "prevention of dissemination." If it means "transfer" as used in the Soviet plan referred to, then it would be difficult if not impossible, for Canadian forces to be given a nuclear capacity. The same would be true if this phrase means increasing existing stockpiles, say in Germany, upon which Canadian forces would draw. On the other hand, if it only means "transfer of control," then the problem is not so great and we could probably live with a resolution in this sense. If it means not adding to the fourth (or fifth) power problem, then too we can see no difficulties. However, what is perhaps more important is not the meaning the Canadian Government attaches to the phrase but the meaning it will be given by others.

5. In these circumstances unqualified support for the principle of preventing the dissemination of nuclear weapons could carry the clear implication that Canada will not seek to give its forces a nuclear capability and that as a consequence we are weakening in our support of the philosophy of the deterrent, and of the principles of collective security and of collective balanced forces. It could also be interpreted as meaning that in the absence of a decision to the contrary the government will proceed with the equipping of our forces in NATO with Honest John launchers and strike aircraft and to install BOMARC in Canada even though none of these weapons will be nuclear-armed. Not to give our NATO forces a nuclear capability could create serious difficulties in respect of agreed NATO plans and at home the government would be open to criticism for acquiring expensive items of hardware that cannot be used to their full potential.

6. If it is considered desirable to accept these risks, then it seems to us that we could support the principle of preventing the dissemination of nuclear weapons provided that at the same time it were made clear that a General Assembly resolution embodying this principle should not be operative until an agreement providing for international control and inspection has been completed and ratified by the states mainly concerned.

7. There are two principal factors which lead us to this conclusion. In the first place, the terms of such a resolution, even if implemented in an international agreement, would not affect the Soviet Union as a power which already has nuclear weapons and which is known to be modernizing its forces in Eastern Europe with most up to date weapons. Secondly, unless effective control is achieved there would be no assurance against the Soviet Union proceeding with the equipment of its satellite forces with all types of nuclear carriers and eventually warheads for them. In such circumstances the present balance in Europe could be materially affected. It would be manifestly unfair and exceedingly dangerous if the Western Powers should unilaterally decide to call a halt to improving their defences simply because the United Nations had agreed to a general resolution on the principle of dissemination in the absence of any concrete proof that the Soviet Union was not proceeding with its efforts to build up its own nuclear capability in Eastern Europe.

ARGUMENT AGAINST SPREADING OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

It is proposed that "tactical" nuclear weapons should be provided to give supporting fire to all units of land forces. Also, tactical aircraft will use nuclear weapons instead of high-explosive bombs or rockets. If military forces so equipped become engaged in any hostilities at all, it would be nuclear warfare.

We have long had "strategic" nuclear weapons of many megatons power. A "strategic" weapon or "weapons system" is intended for the attack of the enemy's centres of industry and population; his war potential. With the provision of the tactical, "low-yield" nuclear weapons, there would be a range of nuclear weapons increasing in power from those attributed to the smallest land force units, to the largest strategic weapons.

The main objection to equipping military forces with the less powerful nuclear weapons for tactical use (that is, against the enemy's armed forces) is that there seems to be no valid reason to doubt that if the use of the so-called tactical nuclear weapons is begun, more and more powerful weapons will be brought into use, until the nuclear war becomes unlimited. This is the so-called escalator effect. The almost irresistible conclusion is that once nuclear arms are used at all, their all-out use must be anticipated, and so the enemy must be defeated by the earliest possible and most powerful attack on his homeland.

Perhaps all this is realized by those advocating the wide distribution of tactical nuclear weapons. The reasoning might be that possible opponents would be warned in the following terms: All elements of our armed forces will use nuclear arms if hostilities begin at all. Therefore, unless you are prepared to face the possibility of an all-out nuclear war, do not attack us, or make any aggressive moves to which our forces will be obliged to react. With the widely-distributed tactical nuclear arms becoming the detonators of full-scale nuclear war, it perhaps is hoped that the rulers of the USSR, not being insane and not wanting full-scale nuclear war, will not use military force to attain any of their ends, if this involves contact with the U.S. or allied forces equipped with tactical nuclear arms.

But is it realistic to hope that this built-in brinkmanship will have such a result, over any considerable period? Is not the threat out of proportion to the kind of aggression it is designed to check? Do the American people and the peoples of their allies really intend to make good on such a threat? Do they wish to secure themselves against any kind of military aggression by responding to it by waging an all-out nuclear war? Put in these terms, the answer is almost certainly no. Commonsense would be that small-scale military aggression employing conventional military forces should be repulsed by the same kind of forces, not by the threat of resorting to all-out nuclear war.

For a threat to deter, the party threatened must be convinced that if he does certain things that he has been warned not to, the threat will be certainly made good. There is a great temptation to test the resolution of the threatener, to see how far it is possible to go towards the prohibited act, without incurring the penalty. Sooner or later, if the threatened punishment is not applied, the deterrent will fail. And the possibility of war through miscalculation becomes considerable.

Then we must consider that if the USA and her allies and clients are equipped with tactical nuclear weapons, it will not be long before the allies and clients of the USSR will be similarly equipped. Recent history teaches us that the USSR is quite as capable of making friends and influencing people by providing them with weapons as the USA is. So, once the spreading of nuclear arms is begun by the USA, we are embarked on a process under which all military forces will have nuclear weapons, sooner or later. The arms race, instead of being moderated, will be intensified. This, accompanied by increasing tensions, will some day or other, in some part of the world, erupt into war in which nuclear weapons will be used, to the extent that the belligerents possess them. Such a war need not necessarily be between the USSR and the USA, or even between a pair of their clients. If this happens in one case, it can happen in others, supposing nothing is done to put an effective stop to war as a means of settling international disputes. So we would gradually acquiesce in the idea of war employing nuclear weapons — which their users would hope would be immediately decisive. Is this the sort of development which will lead to the security of any nation, which will lead to the kind of world we want?

It is clear that certain kinds of aggression which could be carried out by conventionally armed forces would not be considered by the people of the nations possessing nuclear arms to be worth repressing, or repulsing, at the cost of engaging in a nuclear war — or running the risk of employing tactical nuclear weapons, and having the escalator get into operation. In fact, one may hazard the guess that the vast majority of people in any state would not wish to sanction the use of nuclear weapons in any conflict except one in which it appeared the enemy would also use such weapons; in fact, where national survival was at stake.

So, as we would also be reluctant to see our essential political and strategic positions of strength eroded by a serious of minor aggressions, which we would not be prepared to resist at the risk of nuclear war, we find that the only alternative is to have conventional forces of our own.

But such a type of defence could be only a temporary solution, at best. If the world is to have a reasonable chance of avoiding nuclear war, the nuclear arms race must be stopped and then put into reverse — that is, we must commence to disarm. And this can only be done if, first of all, there is agreement between the USSR and the USA that this will be done; that there is no quarrel between them of such gravity that they must resort to nuclear war to resolve it; and that it is their prime duty to preserve peace in the world through the United Nations. Either the USSR and the USA must get together to stop war, or they will one day fight each other with nuclear arms. There is little probability of a lasting stalemate.

As a first step, renunciation of the spreading of nuclear weapons seems reasonable and necessary.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], December 1, 1960

THE IRISH RESOLUTION ON THE PREVENTION OF THE FURTHER SPREAD OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

At the last session of the General Assembly Canada voted in favour of an essentially procedural resolution sponsored by Ireland which called for consideration of the question involved by the Ten Nation Committee. The draft which the Irish have submitted this year differs from last year's proposals in that it proposes substantive measures to deal with the problem.

2. In summary, these proposals call for

(1) governments to "make every effort" to achieve a permanent agreement which would prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons;

(2) "temporary and voluntary" measures, pending the negotiation of such an agreement, under which nations possessing such weapons would "refrain from relinquishing ... control" of them to countries not possessing them;

(3) countries not possessing such weapons to refrain, on a similar "temporary and voluntary" basis, from manufacturing or "otherwise attempting to acquire them."

3. The effects of each of these provisions are discussed in turn below:

(a) Those sections of the resolution which call for an international agreement to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons should cause us no difficulty. Presumably they may be interpreted as proposing the inclusion of measures designed to achieve this aim within a wider agreement on disarmament (perhaps a first-stage "package") under adequate international control. As such they would not run counter to Canadian policy.

(b) As I understand them, the arrangements under which nuclear weapons are supplied by the United States do not call for that country to hand over control of them to the countries in which they are stationed. Even if Canada were to obtain nuclear weapons from the United States under some formula of joint control, it would seem reasonable to assume that this would not constitute relinquishment of control by the USA. Accordingly, it would appear that the second provision of the Irish resolution would also be acceptable to Canada.

(c) Current Canadian defence planning calls for the stationing of such weapons on Canadian territory and for them to be supplied to Canadian forces in Europe. Strictly speaking, this would not be inconsistent with the terms of the resolution, since, if nuclear weapons were stationed in Canada, we still would not have "acquired" them because they would continue to be owned by the USA. However, this line of reasoning may lack force since a state which permits nuclear weapons to be stationed on its territory under joint control and to be supplied to its forces could be said in some sense to be "acquiring" such weapons.

4. The majority of our NATO colleagues intend to abstain on the Irish resolution. The only exceptions, so far as we are aware, are Norway and Denmark, and possibly Iceland. The main reason for adopting this position is the belief that support for the resolution might prejudice the question of a separate NATO nuclear capability.

5. While taking into account the problems which it might raise from the defence and NATO points of view, the Minister has firmly concluded that Canada should vote in favour of the Irish resolution. Canadian support for a permanent agreement on this subject is uncontested. We would also wish to see the great powers refrain from "relinquishing control" of nuclear weapons. The final operative paragraph of the resolution can also be supported in our view because of the strictly temporary nature of the obligation which would be undertaken. However, the principal reason for a vote in favour is that it would be illogical and entirely inconsistent with the forthright stand which Canada has taken on nuclear disarmament for us to do other than support a proposal designed to prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons. We have urged very strongly that the non-nuclear powers should exert pressure on the nuclear powers to pursue negotiations seriously and urgently, and it would be a retreat from this position if we were now to oppose the Irish initiative. This is particularly true in view of the emphasis which we have placed on the role of the non-nuclear powers in the Canadian disarmament proposal now before the First Committee.

6. If it is decided that Canada should vote in favour of the resolution, it would be possible to explain this position in a manner which is consistent with your recent statements, and in particular with your remarks on the subject before the Canadian Club.[88] Our explanation of vote would begin by emphasizing the importance of permanent agreement to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons, and our firm support for this first provision of the resolution. It would then point out that, while we also support the temporary measures called for in the resolution, we could not continue to do so if no progress were made in disarmament negotiations. In conclusion, it would again emphasize the importance which we attach to an early resumption of serious negotiations, and make it plain that we would have to reconsider our support for temporary measures on nuclear weapons if they were not forthcoming. Attached as appendix I to this memorandum is a statement along these lines which Cabinet may wish to approve if it is agreed that Canada should support the Irish proposal.†

IRISH RESOLUTION AT U.N. ON SPREAD OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

12. The Prime Minister read a draft resolution, prepared by Ireland and placed before the General Assembly of the United Nations, on the prevention of the wider dissemination of nuclear weapons. He said that it had previously been anticipated that a few days would be available for consideration of the effect of this resolution on Canada, but advice had just been received that it might come to a vote on this day.

The only part of the resolution presenting problems for Canada was the clause calling upon powers not possessing nuclear weapons to refrain temporarily from manufacturing them or otherwise attempting to acquire them. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recommended that Canada should support the resolution, in order to be consistent with the forthright stand which Canada had taken on nuclear disarmament.

13. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) The resolution should also be considered in the light of Canada's position as a member of N.A.T.O. Most N.A.T.O. countries intended to abstain, because support of the resolution might prejudge the question of a separate N.A.T.O. nuclear capability. The only exceptions were Norway and Denmark, and possibly Iceland. Norway was awaiting Canada's decision and would probably abstain if Canada did. Messrs. Green, Fleming and Harkness would represent Canada at the N.A.T.O. meeting to be held in Paris on December 16th to 18th, and before that meeting the government should avoid getting into an impossible position vis-à-vis Canada's N.A.T.O. allies.

(b) If Canada supported the Irish resolution, the government would have difficulty in explaining why it was preparing to use the CF-104, Honest John and Bomarc, which were intended to have nuclear warheads.

(c) On several recent occasions the Prime Minister had stated publicly that Canada's policy on nuclear weapons had not been definitely determined, but that if Canada at any future time decided it needed nuclear weapons, there must first be agreement with the U.S. on joint control. The logical course would be to abstain from voting on the resolution, because to support it would imply a contradiction of these recent statements.

14. The Cabinet agreed that the Canadian delegation to the United Nations should be instructed to abstain from voting on a draft resolution proposed by Ireland to the General Assembly, on the prevention of the wider dissemination of nuclear weapons.

DISARMAMENT RESOLUTIONS AT THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Green has asked that you be informed of certain developments in connection with the Irish resolution at the United Nations.

The resolution almost came to a vote last evening but the Committee accepted a suggestion by Mr. Nesbitt that because of the lateness of the hour and the probable complication in the voting, it would be advisable to postpone the vote until the next meeting. The Committee is scheduled to meet again on Monday to begin the debate on Algeria and it is therefore not clear how soon a vote on the Irish resolution and other disarmament items will take place.

There has been a change in the voting pattern. It is now known that Norway, Denmark and Iceland all have instructions to vote in favour of the resolution. Greece and Belgium are without definite instructions — their decision lies between a vote in favour and an abstention and our Delegation believes that in the end they will abstain. So far as we know the other NATO countries will also abstain.

The Canadian Delegation in New York has been negotiating with the United States concerning the Canadian resolution. Some progress is being made on a "compromise" text; the United States Delegation is said to be cooperating in an effort to find a mutually agreeable resolution.

DISARMAMENT

On December 1st at 9 p.m. I talked with Mr. Green who was in Seattle and he claimed that he would be in serious difficulty unless the Canadian Government supported the Irish resolution on nuclear weapons.

I advised him that earlier that day at a Cabinet meeting it was decided to support the resolution would be to make a decision that would be inconsistent with our responsibilities in NATO and in any event should not be taken before the meeting of Ministers in Paris.

On December 3rd Mr. Robinson saw me in regard to this question and seemed to lean in favour of giving the resolution Canadian support. He also viewed with some fear the position which Mr. Green would be in and that if Canada abstained Mr. Green, who has become known as the exponent of disarmament in the United Nations, would suffer severe loss of prestige.

The matter can come up again on Monday in Cabinet for reconsideration.

At the same time I told Mr. Robinson that I did not give up hope of any disarmament discussions at this time and that the result was already being felt in Canada for with Maclean's Magazine and other long-hairs talking in favour of there being no nuclear defences, a weakening in Canada's defence effort would be an inevitable result.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY; IRISH RESOLUTION AT THE UNITED NATIONS ON SPREAD OF NUCLEAR ARMS; OTHER ASPECTS

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, in addition to the Irish resolution on the spread of nuclear weapons which would come up for a vote in the United Nations in a few days, there were a number of resolutions on disarmament, one of which Canada had initiated. This was co-sponsored by Norway, Sweden, Chile, and Pakistan amongst others, and called for a neutral chairman of the disarmament committee and an ad hoc committee of non-nuclear powers. The U.S.S.R. would oppose the resolution. The U.S.A. would probably vote for it on the basis of a compromise wording. If it were approved Canada would gain much prestige. There were two other resolutions advocating the end of nuclear tests which Canada proposed to support.

No one would vote against the Irish resolution. All would either vote for it or abstain. Some N.A.T.O. countries would be in the latter group. The United Kingdom wanted to vote for it and had persuaded the Irish to amend the wording, but later the United States had persuaded the U.K. to abstain. If Canada voted in favour, there would be a split with its N.A.T.O. partners. On the other hand, if abstention was to be the course, Canada would be split from the co-sponsors of the resolution on disarmament he had described. Abstention would place him in an impossible position.

In the statements he had made from time to time he had not gone beyond agreed government policy. He had made four speeches which the Prime Minister had approved. The terms of the Irish resolution would only be binding until next September at the latest. It requested nations to refrain from doing certain things "as a temporary and voluntary measure." If it was decided to support the resolution, he would be making a statement at the time which would indicate that, if no progress were made in preventing the spread of nuclear weapons, Canada would have to reconsider its position on the temporary measures proposed.

The U.S. was not pressing Canada to abstain. On the other hand, Mr. Spaak, the Secretary-General to N.A.T.O. was emphasizing the necessity for the organization becoming a nuclear power and attacking the Canadian resolution unfairly in the N.A.T.O. Council. This was embarrassing and was placing Canada in a very difficult position. He might have to speak out strongly against Spaak at the forthcoming N.A.T.O. meeting.

18. During the discussion the following points were made:

(a) Voting for the Irish resolution would make it impossible to hold discussions with the U.S. on the acquisition of nuclear weapons or warheads for the CF-104, the BOMARC and the Honest John. It had to be remembered that these weapons would be virtually ineffective without nuclear warheads. Indeed, the CF-104 would have to be redesigned to take a conventional weapon and conventional warheads were not being produced for the BOMARC I. The Honest John could be fitted with a conventional H.E. warhead.

(b) An affirmative vote would make the public feel that the government had washed its hands of nuclear weapons and the next step would be strong criticism of the government for spending so much money on carriers for these weapons.

(c) Some argued that discussions with the U.S. could go ahead because all that was being considered was the question of joint control if and when the weapons might be acquired.

(d) Having supported the N.A.T.O. position in 1957 on the stockpiling of nuclear weapons in Europe and on the placing of intermediate range ballistic missiles at SACEUR's disposal, Canada could hardly turn around now and vote for the Irish resolution.

(e) The CF-104's would start coming off the assembly lines towards the end of 1961 and the BOMARC would be ready about the same time. If a decision were not made soon, the government would be acutely embarrassed by having very expensive but virtually useless equipment on its hands. In addition, the U.S. was anxious to have a Canadian decision on the question of defensive nuclear warheads for their squadrons at Goose Bay and Harmon Field.

(f) It would be a few months before the new U.S. administration was established in office. During this period effective discussions with the U.S. would not be practicable. Therefore, there could be no question of Canada attempting to acquire these weapons for a time. The real question was what was the definition of the term "temporary" in the resolution.

19. The Prime Minister said that the difficulty with which the government was confronted underlined the danger of Ministers making conflicting statements in public. On the one hand, there were the oft expressed views about disarmament. He personally did not have much hope for success in this field. On the other, there were the views in favour of having the forces of the West, including Canada's, as strongly and most effectively armed and equipped as possible. In future only the Prime Minister should make statements on policy respecting nuclear weapons.

The Cabinet should not decide at this time whether or not nuclear weapons should be acquired. The statement he had made in February, 1959 on this subject still stood. The government was also bound by the agreement reached at the N.A.T.O. Heads of Government meeting in December, 1957.[89] However, weapons and warheads would be acquired only if the principle of joint control was accepted.

He was not so anxious to reach agreement for storage at Goose and Harmon for U.S. forces because this would weaken Canada's bargaining power with the U.S. on other issues, for example the possible arrangement to sell CL-44 aircraft.

He emphasized again the necessity for remaining silent so far as possible on these matters. If the differences continued in public, it was clear that a Minister would have to resign and this was the last thing he wanted.

The statement the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have to make at the U.N. on voting for the Irish resolution should be modified, particularly so that it would be made clear that, if there was no progress in the immediate future on the prevention of the spread of these weapons, Canada would have to review her position. While disarmament was a laudable purpose he was afraid of the Conservative party being dubbed the disarmament party. At the N.A.T.O. meeting in Paris later in the month, the Canadian delegation should recognize that the government was morally bound by the decision reached at N.A.T.O. in December, 1957 and, as regards the proposed unified deterrent under N.A.T.O. control, it should not make any commitment.

20. During the further discussion the following additional points were made:

(a) The position which was emerging from the discussion was not to be interpreted as committing Canada to a slowing down of the procurement of carriers for nuclear weapons nor ruling out discussions, when the time was ripe, on the acquisition of warheads.

(b) Some would interpret the word "temporary" in the resolution as a period of years. This pointed to the necessity of the proposed statement being changed as had been proposed.

[89] Voir/See Volume 24, document 256.

21. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that the Canadian delegation at the United Nations should vote in favour of the Irish resolution recommending restraints on the spread of nuclear weapons, subject to making a statement along the lines suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but with the last sentence changed to read "If, however, there is no significant progress in this field in the immediate future we will reconsider our position on the temporary measures which are proposed in this resolution;"

(b) that only the Prime Minister should make public statements regarding Canadian policy in respect of nuclear weapons; these should so far as possible be in Parliament, and other Ministers should, when it is necessary to refer to Canadian policy in these matters, quote the Prime Minister or use the same wording;

(c) discussions (or "negotiations") with the U.S. Government concerning arrangements for the essential acquisition of nuclear weapons or warheads for use by the Canadian forces, in the manners already decided, may proceed as soon as they can usefully be undertaken but the acceptance of joint control is to be a basic principle;

(d) an agreement with the United States concerning the storage of defensive nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Field for the U.S. Air Defence forces should not be concluded until after discussions with the United States on other matters had been concluded;

(e) in the discussions at the N.A.T.O. meeting this month, Canadian Ministers should recognize that the government has agreed, at the meeting in December 1957 and at other times, and is morally bound, to supply Canadian forces under N.A.T.O. command equipped and ready to use nuclear weapons if and when they are necessary;

(f) in the discussions at N.A.T.O. this month, Canadian Ministers should not make any commitment to agree to a unified deterrent under N.A.T.O. control and a decision on this question should await a N.A.T.O. Heads of Government meeting after the new U.S. President has taken office;

(g) preparations should continue to enable the Canadian forces to have the vehicles, missiles, bases, training and other requirements to enable them to be ready to use nuclear weapons to be acquired from the United States under joint control arrangements if and when the adoption of these weapons is considered necessary.

(N.B. Wording as approved by the Prime Minister).[90]

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur en France

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in France

TELEGRAM S-459 Ottawa, November 22, 1960

CONFIDENTIAL. PRIORITY.

Reference: London, Washington, Permis New York, Cairo, CCOS, NATO Paris (Priority) (Information).

ALGERIA

The Department has been considering what line should best be taken by our delegation in the debate and voting on the Algerian item when it comes before the UNGA. Until recently it had been feared that this item would be one of the most embarrassing on the agenda, confronting us with the alternative of withdrawing support from a friend and ally or appearing to support France regardless of the merits of the case and against the opposition of our Afro-Asian friends.

2. The recent initiatives by the French government in pressing on with General de Gaulle's plans for the solution of the Algerian problem have, in our view, made the situation a great deal easier. It is our understanding that the French program now envisages the following stages:

(a) A referendum which would enable the separation of the Algerian departments from metropolitan France and set up an interim régime which, while obviously not completely independent of France, would nevertheless be free to negotiate the conditions under which a fully independent Algerian republic could be established.

(b) The interim régime would make contact with the FLN to arrange a cease fire and the commencement of negotiations leading to the preparation of a referendum by the Algerian people on the future of Algeria.

(c) The holding of the referendum presumably in the presence of foreign observers.

(d) The establishment of a government of the fully independent Republic of Algeria and the determination of its relationship with its neighbors and with France (conceivably this might be included in the referendum).

3. Although the various elements in this program may well be juggled to suit the political situation in France, in Algeria and in the UN, it is our view that the process now begun is not reversible.

4. This program concerns Canada in two contexts; UNGA and NATO. So far as the UN is concerned, we consider that there are impressive indications that a solution fully consistent with the Charter is being worked out and that no other agency exists which is in as good a position as de Gaulle to promote this solution. The question for us, therefore, is to decide how the UN can best contribute to the solution of the Algerian problem which we now think is beginning to emerge along lines which we had hoped it would. In the NATO context, the question will eventually arise as to what should be the future relationship, if any, between the organization and "the Algerian departments of France" of Article 6 of the Treaty.

5. We should be grateful for any indication that you may be able to offer on whether our views of the future of Algeria are shared in your capital and what attitude the government to which you are accredited is likely to take in the discussion of this item at the UNGA.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY. [Ottawa], December 13, 1960

15TH ASSEMBLY: ALGERIA

During my stay in New York I had some opportunity to discuss the Assembly proceedings on Algeria. The debate is continuing in the First Committee and at the time of adjournment last evening, 37 speakers remained to be heard. Yesterday the representative of Burma introduced the 21-power draft resolution, which calls for a referendum in Algeria under United Nations auspices.

2. Yesterday afternoon rumours ran around the corridors that the African-Asians were intending to accelerate the debate in the First Committee in order to come to the vote quickly. At one stage it was feared that they would try to force a vote yesterday, when, because of the snow, many delegations were not present, especially the Latin Americans and other supporters of France. Another rumour was that the African-Asians were planning to transfer the Algerian debate from the First Committee to plenary ostensibly because of the rioting and suppressive measures in Algeria. One reason why the African-Asians would prefer to have the item in plenary, however, is that they expect shortly to have the Congo question there and they would not wish to have concurrent debates, one in the First Committee and the other in plenary, on these two subjects which are of great interest to almost all the African-Asians. My guess is that yesterday at least some of the African-Asian group were toying with these ideas but that no agreement could be reached on tactics. Some of them began to speak, however, about accelerating the debate in the First Committee. If the expected veto develops in the Security Council, the Congo question will probably pass at once to the plenary session and there could be some move in the First Committee to transfer Algeria as well.

3. It seems that the French have abandoned earlier efforts to have tabled in the First Committee a competing resolution. The French have calculated that the 21-power text (Candel Telegram 2586 of December 10, attached)† is so extreme that it will not gain a two-thirds majority. Operative paragraph 4 is considered particularly objectionable because it attempts to impose a United Nations referendum without any reference to the position of France and, of course, in the face of known French opposition. Accordingly, the French tactics are to allow this text to be put to the vote unamended in order to demonstrate to its co-sponsors that they will not have sufficient support for its adoption.

4. Some observers wonder whether the French are being too optimistic in their calculation of votes. Undoubtedly they are counting heavily on all their friends to vote against the African-Asian text. I had no opportunity to take sufficient soundings to enable me to draw any conclusion but some of my experienced friends believe that the French may succeed in their objective.

7. During the flight back to Ottawa, the Minister discussed the Algerian debate with Mr. Campbell and myself. He had talks yesterday with Dr. Fawzi (UAR) and Mr. Jawad (Iraq), who undoubtedly made a strong bid to win Canadian support for the African-Asian position on Algeria. The Minister feared that Canadian support for France would be resented by the African-Asians and we discussed whether Canada should abstain in the voting. I stressed that France would attach the greatest importance to the votes cast by its NATO allies. Mr. Campbell and I emphasized as well that General de Gaulle should be supported because if he could not succeed in Algeria, it was extremely unlikely that any other French leader could and the situation both in Algeria and France might deteriorate gravely. In the end, the Minister seemed disposed to hold to a position in support of France but he is today to discuss the whole question with the Prime Minister. He instructed me, moreover, to inform the European Division even though Canada might vote with France, we should try in our statement to soften the African-Asian reaction by showing understanding and sympathy for their point of view. The strongest argument, in the Minister's view, for supporting France, was the need to give General de Gaulle every chance to succeed with his announced policy.

8. The Minister said that we should instruct the Delegation to keep in close touch with the United States delegation on this matter. He believed that the Canadian and United States positions on Algeria were almost identical. He recalled that at the 14th session, the United States had abstained in the final voting, whereas the Canadian Delegation had voted against the African-Asian resolution. He saw no reason why Canada should be more forthcoming than the United States in supporting France on this matter.[91]

I attach for your signature, if you agree, a telegram† to our delegation in New York instructing them to vote against the Afro-Asian resolution on Algeria which will probably come up for a vote late today in the First Committee.

Before he left, Mr. Green instructed us to keep in close touch with the United States on this and to avoid being isolated in a small minority. We have now been informed that the U.S.A. intends to vote against the Afro-Asian resolution and is anxious to know how we intend to vote on the matter. Accordingly to our best information a number of the Latin American countries, the United Kingdom and the U.S.A. will be voting against the resolution. There is a possibility that African members of the French Community may abstain because of the recent trouble in Algeria and there is some talk of abstentions by New Zealand and some Scandinavian delegations, although this is by no means certain.

Noted. N.A. R[obertson] 14.12-60.

It seems, therefore, that by voting against this resolution we would be following our own convictions on the merits of the case; we would be in line with the U.S.A. whose position on such matters is similar to our own and we would not find ourselves in an embarrassingly small minority.

It is expected that the Afro-Asian resolution will get the simple majority required to refer it from the First Committee to the Plenary Session of the General Assembly. It is much less likely that it will get the required two-thirds majority in the Plenary Session and some modification of the present extreme resolution may be forthcoming there.

I also attach a copy of our telegram S-487 of December 14† sent to New York suggesting certain lines which might be taken by the delegation in explaining a vote cast against the Afro-Asian resolution.

ALGERIA

I attach for your approval, if you agree, a telegram†[92] instructing our delegation on how it should vote when the Algerian item comes up for consideration today in the Plenary Session of the General Assembly. The voting will be on two amendments and the original Afro-Asian resolution which was approved by the First Committee.

The first amendment, (Document A/L 334 attached)† submitted by the African members of the Community, meets our objection to the Afro-Asian resolution in that it does not attempt to force the United Nations into a role which might complicate or jeopardize General de Gaulle's present initiative. At the same time it does affirm the United Nations' interest in the problem and should help to keep a desirable amount of pressure on all concerned in Algeria and in France to come to terms.

The Cypriot amendment (Document A/L 333 attached)† is slightly less objectionable than the Afro-Asian paragraph that it seeks to replace in that it "recommends" a course of action rather than "decides" and it is slightly less rigid in saying what the United Nations' role should be in an Algerian referendum. It is nevertheless still open to the objection that it cannot obtain the support of those whose cooperation would be necessary to make it work, hence it offers no hope of providing a solution itself but it could complicate the working out of General de Gaulle's present initiative.

The instructions to our delegation suggest that we should vote on the Afro-Asian resolution in exactly the same way as we did in the First Committee. This is noted on a text of the resolution attached. Should, however, the French Community amendment (Document A/L 334) be approved by the General Assembly and thereby substituted for operative paragraph 4 of the Afro-Asian text it would then be in order for the delegation to vote in favour of the resolution as a whole. Otherwise they should vote against it as they did in the First Committee.[93] [94]

Le président du Pakistan

President of Pakistan
to Prime Minister

Karachi, November 29, 1960

Mr. Prime Minister,

You should recall that in April, 1959, I sent a message regarding my talk with Mr. Farhat Abbas to President de Gaulle and offered the services of my Government for a peaceful settlement of the Algerian issue. I also informed your Government of this move. Since then, as you know, the situation in Algeria has worsened. My apprehensions of Communist infiltration in to the area do not appear to have been altogether unjustified. Soviet Union and China have both promised economic and military support to the Algerian Nationalists and with this new development, I am afraid, the Nationalist elements within Algeria may fall an easy prey to Communist propaganda and their movement cannot but come under the influence of Communists. This would be most undesirable both for future friendly relations between France and Algeria and for international peace and security. A situation similar to that which developed in French Indo-China some years ago might arise and result in the establishment of a firm Communist foothold in Africa. The Communist countries will only be too glad to exploit the situation to their advantage and to the loss of the free world. I am aware, Mr. Prime Minister, of the efforts made by the French President to work out a solution acceptable both to the peoples of France and Algeria, and we do appreciate his difficulties of arriving at such a mutually agreed solution. I, however, feel that under the circumstances a reference to the people concerned on the basis of the principle of self-determination, conducted impartially, is possibly the only means of resolving the issue peacefully.

Aligned, as Pakistan is, on the one hand with France and the free world by ties of friendly collaboration and as partners in SEATO, and on the other with the people of Algeria by common bonds of religion, I sincerely desire that peace be restored in the strife-torn area and once more friendly relations be established between the peoples of France and Algeria so that they may be able to divert their resources to peaceful uses and concentrate their energies on raising the standard of living and providing fruits of peace and progress to their peoples. As partners in arms against Communist expansion and members of the UN pledged to the cause of peace, justice and to the right of self-determination, I would like to request you, Mr. Prime Minister, to use your good offices and influence with the French Government and impress upon them the necessity of a very early settlement of the issue. The situation is fast deteriorating and calls for determined efforts not only by the peoples of France and Algeria bu

Prime Minister to President of Pakistan

[Ottawa], December 27, 1960

Dear Mr. President:

It was most interesting to read your letter of November 29 in which you told me of your misgivings over the Algerian struggle. My assessment of the Algerian situation is very close to your own; it is one of the most dangerous situations with which we are faced in the world today. As a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we are particularly apprehensive of the possibilities open to communist infiltration in an area of such great interest to us. We are also unhappy that one of our allies should be involved in a struggle of this nature.

Since you wrote your letter, the subject has been before the General Assembly of the United Nations. Our attitude there has been governed entirely by what we thought offered the best chance of bringing about an end to conflict. In deciding what line we should take, we were mindful of the consideration you brought to my attention in your letter as well as those mentioned by your Foreign Minister to our Acting High Commissioner in Karachi. I think that, in the end, the United Nations vote was just about the best that could have been hoped for. As you will know from our vote and from the statement made by our Delegation,[95] and from my own explanations in the House of Commons here,[96] we were concerned lest any action taken by the United Nations would complicate or jeopardize General de Gaulle's latest initiative. On the other hand, we have never taken the view that the United Nations had no interest in this problem. On the contrary we have always considered that the best role the United Nations could play in the dispute was to place as much pressure as possible on all parties concerned to settle the matter by peaceful means. For this reason, we were happy to be able to vote for the resolution of which Pakistan was one of the co-sponsors after the provision of direct United Nations intervention had been deleted.

I will not attempt to prophesy how events in Algeria will move, but it is our hope that recent events, including the United Nations resolution, will urge on all concerned the necessity for speed. I should hope that after General de Gaulle has had his referendum and obtained a mandate from the French people that he will set in train an irrevocable series of acts leading eventually to the holding of a referendum under conditions which will be acceptable to the Algerian people as a whole. (The part to be played by the United Nations in such a referendum would, in keeping the United Nations practice elsewhere, depend upon the wishes of the people living in Algeria themselves).

We are, as I have already said, keenly interested in seeing this conflict settled and, as events unfold, I would be more than happy to have your views on how this end, in which we are both so interested, might best be achieved.

With every good wish for the New Year,

Yours sincerely,

SOUTH AFRICAN ITEMS AT THE 1960 GENERAL ASSEMBLY

You asked that the Departmental memorandum of October 4 on this subject be shown to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has now examined the memorandum and has authorized me to report to you that he was very favourably impressed by it. He commented specifically on its economy of language and its logical presentation, and he approved the direction of the reasoning. Accordingly, as far as the Prime Minister is concerned, guidance for the Delegation based on the memorandum would certainly be acceptable.[97]

SOUTH AFRICAN ITEMS AT THE 1960 GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The Commentary Items on Race Conflict in South Africa, Treatment of Indians in South Africa, and South West Africa give the Delegation most of the pertinent background information and also suggest general lines for use in speeches (regardless of how we vote) but in effect leave all substantive decisions on voting to be taken by yourself in the light of all the circumstances prevailing at the time the issues come to a head in the Assembly. For your own consideration we append some supplementary comments on:

A. Policy considerations involved for Canada; and

B. Suggested tactics on specific items.

A. POLICY CONSIDERATIONS INVOLVED FOR CANADA

In addition to those general considerations mentioned in Section E of the Commentary Article on Race Conflict in South Africa there are other points which you may wish to bear in mind. In the past Canadian policy on the three South African items has in part been based on the premise that the best hope of moderating the South African position was to abstain on resolutions directly critical of the Union in order to lessen the chance of its leaving the United Nations. At the same time we have shown by voting affirmatively on some paragraphs and by our statements in the debate that in principle we disapproved of racial discrimination. It has been hoped that by this means we could at once demonstrate the general Canadian opposition to racial discrimination and yet be in a position to exert a friendly influence behind the scenes which would help persuade South Africa to change its racial policies. Recent events, especially during the past year, indicate that it is questionable whether this policy now has much chance of accomplishing the objects mentioned as long as the current South African government remains in power. It is quite conceivable, however, that events elsewhere in Africa as well as internal pressures may, in time, lead to a change of government in the Union; in the event all our thinking about the Union would have to be re-examined and the following comments might prove to be no longer valid. At present, though, there are two main factors which lead us to suggest a somewhat different emphasis in our policy.

(1) There is no evidence whatever that Canada has influenced South African racial policies in the past or that we are likely to do so in the near future. Regardless of the oft-repeated views of well-disposed countries like Canada, the present Union government has steadily intensified the application of apartheid. This policy has led to the denial of more and more basic rights to Europeans as well as Africans until now, as the Bishop of Johannesburg recently observed, the Union has many of the characteristics of a police state. The South African Government gives every impression of having a completely closed mind on this subject by its exasperating refusal to make a token gesture of compromise or even to consent to listen to the private comments of its friends (as shown by Mr. Louw's performance at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting). Even the events in the Congo have not convinced the Union of the need for promoting educational and political advancement of Africans, along British rather than Belgian lines. Indicating his intention to be at least as self-confident and unyielding as before, Prime Minister Verwoerd said recently that "we shall be going to the United Nations to maintain our point of view and not to lie down. If our standpoint had been understood by the U.N. the situation in the Congo would not have arisen … There are those who speak of partnership and of concessions. Belgium made concessions and the Congo was the heritage."

The Union government's attitude towards the Commonwealth is another indication that South Africa is unlikely to be swayed by any friendly influence which Canada may exert. Pretoria is going ahead with its plebiscite on republicanism despite the unmistakable warning from Commonwealth Prime Ministers that by doing so the Union's continued membership in the Commonwealth would be placed in jeopardy. In subsequent public discussion of the Commonwealth connection, the present political leaders of South Africa have given no indication that they are concerned about preserving fraternal ties with Canada or that they are aware that in the past Canada has gone out of its way to be moderate and understanding in its consideration of South African questions. Their only concern seems to be to preserve Commonwealth trade preferences with the United Kingdom. Although the questions of racial policy and of Commonwealth membership are not formally linked, they are likely to be associated together in the minds of Commonwealth leaders and it would seem advisable to keep in touch with other Commonwealth missions at the U.N. on their thinking on both these matters.

(2) Canadian policy on these items may be getting out of touch with changing international and domestic opinion. International opinion is becoming more outspoken on this question, mainly because South African policies are increasingly antipathetic to current international conditions in which non-white peoples are becoming more important and are demanding recognition of the equality of all races. The situation has been exacerbated, of course, by the blatant Soviet attempts to exploit this colour sensitivity and lingering anti-colonial sentiment in an effort to woo the new nations, particularly in Africa. Reflecting this changing atmosphere, ten Western nations (including the United States, New Zealand and Italy as well as Canada) switched their votes from abstention to the affirmative on the apartheid resolution in 1958 and there has been a similar shift on the other two items. Last year all these nations (except Canada) continued to support the resolution and in addition Australia and Belgium changed from a negative vote to an abstention while The Netherlands has since said that in the future it will also move from a negative vote to an abstention on resolutions approximating the 1959 one. There have, of course, been many indications, beginning with Mr. Macmillan's "winds of change" speech, that the United Kingdom is finding it increasingly difficult to count on any domestic support for South African policies. It might also be kept in mind that, as a whole, the colonial powers are less likely to have strong feelings about our vote on these issues than are the emergent countries; some of whom are also members or prospective members of the Commonwealth and our very good friends: India, Malaya, Ghana, Nigeria and the West Indies.

It is difficult to assess how Canadian public opinion views the question at present. On the one hand the Sharpeville shootings last spring strongly reinforced the trend towards outright and unqualified condemnation of South Africa. On the other hand, the events in the Congo and particularly the man-handling of Canadian troops by Congolese soldiers may have served to convince many Canadians that no Africans — wherever they live and whatever superficial veneer of civilization they may have acquired — are capable of governing themselves. As a corollary there may be some feeling in Canada that the white minorities who wish to retain political control over the Africans may well have some arguments in their favour. The most important consideration, however, is that the Canadian Government seems formally committed to a policy of opposition to racial discrimination wherever it appears and a policy of interest in the political and economic development of the peoples of Africa. The Prime Minister's several forthright statements deploring events in South Africa and your own expressions of friendship and respect for the emergent countries of Africa are so well known that Canadian policy at the U.N. will be expected to mirror them.

It would be very difficult indeed to work out a policy reconciling all the various considerations. However, by moving to a somewhat less negative but still moderate position Canadian policy could probably be brought more into line with the changed situation of today. By speaking out clearly and voting for any moderate resolution and by opposing or abstaining on any harshly condemnatory resolution we could demonstrate to Canadians, Afro-Asians and South Africans alike that the Canadian Government is concerned about the problem and anxious to encourage the South African authorities to begin moving in the right direction. We could probably increase the effectiveness of this policy by making it known in the corridors in advance that while we did not wish to co-sponsor any resolutions, we were prepared to cooperate informally with other members working toward reasonable resolutions on the three subjects. It would be useful to keep in particularly close touch with Australia and New Zealand which are in much the same position as ourselves and with Pakistan which has remained very moderate in its approach to South African questions. If at the same time we made it clear that we would not countenance extreme resolutions calling for such things as boycott or expulsion and that all we are seeking is to encourage South Africa to make gradual changes for its own good, we could in large measure avoid getting the Union's back up.

The changed situation in South Africa this year and the intensification of racial conflict in other parts of Africa would make it unlikely that we would be accused of inconsistency this year should we shift our vote. In any event it can be explained that our long-term objectives remain the same and the shift represents only a change in tactics, in the altered circumstances, to reach those objectives.

The tactical problems involved for these items may be quite different this year. In the past, differences of opinion over the substance of the apartheid resolution have for the most part been ironed out quietly in the corridors. However, this year the Africans and some Asians may be adamant in demanding an extreme resolution mentioning boycott and expulsion or both on any of the three items and this might lead to competing resolutions and a split in the ranks of the normal supporters of resolutions on the subject. The Scandinavians, some Latins, and moderate Asian delegations such as Japan, Turkey, Pakistan and the Philippines might refuse to support a boycott resolution but would be prepared to support a milder one as in the past. Such a development might present the Canadian delegation with a good opportunity to work with moderate elements for the drawing up of a reasonable resolution capable of attracting broadly based support.

More detailed suggestions on possible courses of action on each item are attached.†

B. SUGGESTED COURSES OF ACTION

South West Africa

All the indications are that the African nations plan to make their main assault on this item because they believe that the South African position is weakest here. Indeed, there is little that can be said in defence of the Union's conduct of the mandate and there is probably widespread international agreement with the recent Times editorial which said "no amount of ingenious chicanery can obscure the simple basic facts about South West Africa. It was placed under the mandatory system of the League of Nations in order that its wretched tribesmen might be given a new deal in the light of decent world opinion. Instead of fulfilling this obligation of honour the South African Government, quibbling barefacedly about the succession from League to United Nations, has swallowed South West Africa into its vile scheme of apartheid ... There is only one verdict possible in this sorry business. A mandate has been stolen and the thieves are vainly protesting their innocence."

In order to continue our past efforts to promote an atmosphere conducive to fruitful negotiations the delegation might abstain on any resolutions which are generally condemnatory or which would have the effect of extending the degree of U.N. supervision of South West Africa beyond the limits envisaged by the Court in its advisory opinion of 1950. Nor would you likely wish to support a resolution along the lines of the Nkrumah proposal calling on the Union to turn over the mandate voluntarily to the independent African states. We would not object in principle if South Africa were prepared to surrender South West Africa to such a condominium under the International Trusteeship System (for we have supported condominium mandates in the South Pacific) but it would be difficult to support this particular resolution because it seems unrealistic and unlikely to accomplish anything at present. There is no chance that the present Union Government would surrender South West Africa (with the possible exception of a tribal reserve in the North) to any other nation, least of all to the African states. Furthermore, even if South Africa did agree, such a precipitate transfer of authority would cause severe financial hardship in South West Africa whose economy and lines of communication are closely linked with the Union. If the Africans press this proposal we might raise the question of how they would propose to supply enough trained administrators, technicians, and capital to run the territory.

As in the past the delegation could support a broad resolution of a mild nature appealing to South Africa to reconsider its position. It might also work with others toward the setting up of a negotiating body acceptable to South Africa along the lines of Mr. Louw's letter of July 29, 1960 to the Committee on South West Africa.

However, in order not to leave the impression that Canada condones either the practice of apartheid in the territory or Mr. Louw's attempts to vilify the character of every petitioner, and in order to show that we are prepared to move with the changing times in Africa, the delegation might be instructed to vote with the Asians and Africans on minor issues. There no longer seems much value in abstaining as a matter of course on all hearings of petitioners, especially now that the International Court has advised that they are permissible. Even the Scandinavians vote for the hearings on the grounds that they are bound to be held anyway. Our voting would have more point to it if we voted to hear those petitioners who are reasonable individuals possessing a real knowledge of conditions in the Territory and abstained, as the Scandinavians and moderate Asians and Latins do, only on dubious petitioners (such as the three young Americans who appeared last year after having visited the Territory only briefly). The delegation might also vote in favour of any moderate resolution expressing regret at the loss of life resulting from action taken by the police and soldiers at Windhoek. If the resolution also requested the Union to provide compensation to the families of the victims we might abstain on that clause. Provided the resolution as a whole was not intemperate, our support of it would be in line with the Canadian government's publicly-expressed regret at the tragic situations which have given rise to loss of life as a result of the way in which the Union has applied the policy of apartheid. It would also be consistent with Canadian policy if the delegation supported any resolutions along the lines of the committee's recommendations on increasing the opportunities for residents of the Territory to study abroad.

Treatment of Indians in South Africa (Item 70)

Clearly you would wish the delegation to oppose any call for economic sanctions or threats of expulsion. The delegation might also abstain on any resolution which as a whole condemns South Africa, calls upon the Union to revoke specific legislation, or declares that South Africa's treatment of its Indian community constitutes a threat to peace. To be consistent with past policy the delegation would also abstain on any clause implying the automatic inclusion of the item on the agenda of a future session, e.g., "invites the parties concerned to report to the General Assembly regarding the progress of negotiations" but it would support the 1958 formula which used the phrase "invites reports regarding any progress which may be made in the negotiations." (This wording has the advantage of conceding indirectly that no progress may be made during the year and therefore no report may be necessary.)

You may wish to leave no doubt that Canada is anxious to do whatever it can to promote more harmonious race relations in South Africa and better understanding between South Africa on the one hand and India and Pakistan on the other. The delegation might therefore make it known in the corridors that we are willing to support a moderate resolution on the lines of those we supported in 1949 and in 1958 calling for the holding of direct talks between the parties without prejudice to their respective juridical stands. We could also support any resolution which seeks to remind all member states of their obligations under the Charter and appeals in general terms for a revision of South African racial policies. If a situation develops in which some delegations are soliciting support for an extreme resolution you might wish to have the Canadian delegation take part in devising a milder competing resolution.

If the circumstances seem suspicious such a resolution might include a proposal to refer the question to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion on whether the Cape Town Agreements and the U.N. Charter impose any legal obligations on South Africa in respect of its treatment of Indians. Alternatively, a slightly different clause might be suggested appealing to the governments concerned to attempt to reach an agreement through direct negotiation, mediation, or conciliation and failing that, to submit the question to the International Court. Proposals along these lines were suggested in 1946 and 1947 and supported by a number of delegations including Canada, the United States, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Scandinavians, and Brazil. Although they were opposed by India and defeated by a narrow majority in those years it is possible that the Indians and their supporters would be willing to consider such proposals now that they have seen the ineffectiveness of so many other types of resolutions.

Race Conflict in South Africa (Apartheid Item)

It would not seem appropriate to support any resolution which is unduly condemnatory in tone, or singles out South Africa unduly without bearing in mind the prevalence of racial discrimination elsewhere, or calls for economic sanctions, or threatens the expulsion of South Africa from the U.N., or proposes anything which amounts to intervention in the Union's internal affairs. Any resolutions brought forward could, of course, be examined paragraph by paragraph to see whether there might be certain sections on which we should vote differently than on the resolution as a whole (as we have done in the past). The delegation will presumably take steps to make it clear that Canada abhors racial discrimination wherever it occurs and is anxious to do whatever it can to promote better race relations in South Africa. To emphasize this attitude the delegation might therefore make it known in the corridors that we were prepared to support any moderate resolution along the lines of that which we supported in 1958 or possibly (as a reflection of rising international concern) somewhat stronger in tone as distinct from substance. The delegation could also indicate that Canada would be willing to consider any new, positive, non-condemnatory approach to the problem. One possibility might be to broaden the existing mandate to the Secretary-General (under Security Council Resolution of April 1, 1960) to explore the question with the South African Government. If a situation develops in which some delegations are soliciting support for an extreme resolution, the Canadian delegation could usefully take part in devising a milder competing resolution designed to win the backing of a broadly-representative group of moderates. In any event, it is recommended that the delegation make a formal statement during the debate setting forth clearly the Canadian position.

If a suitable opportunity should arise the delegation might be authorized to intimate privately to the South African delegation that the position of South Africa's friends would be easier if the Union itself made some gesture to international opinion by modifying some of the harsher aspects of its racial policies.[98]

AGENDA ITEM 43 – CHAPTER VIII [Ottawa, n.d.]
CONFIDENTIAL

QUESTION OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA

Summary

The debate on South West Africa at the first part of the fifteenth session marked something of a watershed in U.N. discussions of this item. On all sides there was express or tacit acceptance of the fact that negotiations with the Union Government, pursued over many years, had proved entirely fruitless. Resolution 1360 (XIV) had invited the Union Government to enter into negotiations with the Committee on South West Africa. South Africa's response to the Committee's approach was completely negative although the Minister of External Affairs of the Union reiterated the willingness of the Union Government to enter into discussions with some ad hoc U.N. body, appointed after prior consultation with South Africa, which would be empowered to explore all possibilities. The Assembly was in a mood for more positive action and the applications by Liberia and Ethiopia instituting contentious proceedings against South Africa in the International Court merely strengthened the belief of the African-Asians that the U.N. should no longer be content with vain appeals for the co-operation of South Africa.

2. The 6 resolutions adopted under this item abandon all attempt at negotiations with the Union Government; they concentrate on the plight of the people in South West Africa and contain a number of key paragraphs which deplore and disapprove of the policy practised by the Government of South Africa in South West Africa. Canada voted for all of these resolutions except the last which invites the Committee on South West Africa to go to the territory immediately.

(a) Draft resolution I (See Annex II) on "Petitions relating to the Territory of South West Africa" was adopted 60 (Canada)-0-6 in Committee and 82 (Canada)-0-5 in plenary.

(b) Draft resolution II (See Annex III) on "Political freedom in South West Africa" urged the Union Government to cease the arbitrary imprisoning and deporting of Africans and to ensure the free exercise of political rights by all sectors of the population. It was adopted 62 (Canada)-0-8 in the Committee and 84 (Canada)-0-7 in plenary.

(c) Draft resolution III (See Annex IV) on "Legal action to ensure the fulfilment of the obligations assumed by the Union of South Africa in respect of the Territory of South West Africa" commended the governments of Ethiopia and Liberia upon their initiative in bringing the dispute with South African before the International Court. It was adopted 73 (Canada)-0-5 in Committee and 86 (Canada)-0-6 in plenary.

(d) Draft resolution IV (See Annex V) on "Assistance of U.N. Specialized Agencies in the economic, social and educational development of South West Africa" invited a number of Specialized Agencies to undertake urgent programmes to assist the indigenous population of the Territory. It was adopted 78 (Canada)-0-1 in Committee and unanimously in plenary.

(e) Draft resolution V (See Annex VI) on "The Windhoek Location" requested South Africa to take steps to prosecute and punish the police and civilian officials responsible for the death of eleven Africans in the December 1959 disturbances. It was adopted 75 (Canada)-0-6 in Committee and 83 (Canada)-0-7 in plenary.

(f) Draft resolution VI (See Annex VII) "Question of South West Africa" had three important operative paragraphs which: (1) deplored and disapproved of the policy practised by South Africa contrary to its obligations under the Mandate; (2) deprecated the application of the policy of apartheid in South West Africa; and (3) invited the South West Africa Committee to go to the Territory immediately to investigate the situation and report back to the General Assembly. Canada, Ireland, the Scandinavians, New Zealand and the Netherlands voted in favour of the first two of these paragraphs. The African-Asians considered these as key votes. In the case of the third paragraph the basic difficulty was that it attempted to extend U.N. supervision beyond that exercised by the League of Nations under the Mandate. We supported amendments proposed by India which would have left the South West Africa Committee with complete discretion regarding the means it might adopt. When these were not accepted by the co-sponsors we felt compelled to abstain on the resolution as a whole in the company of Ireland, Austria, Greece, Japan, Finland and the administering powers. The vote on the resolution in Committee was 65-0-15 (Canada) and in plenary 78-0-15 (Canada).

The Debate

3. At the beginning of the session the Fourth Committee considered the usual series or requests for hearings by petitioners. Canada voted for hearing all the petitioners on the ground that they were either inhabitants of the territory or such well-known spokesmen for South West Africa as the Rev. Michael Scott. In contrast to last year's vote on petitioners from South West Africa, Canada moved from abstention to an affirmative vote while the U.K. changed from a negative vote to an abstention.

4. When debate began on the item Mr. Louw, the South African Minister of External Affairs, argued that because of the Ethiopian-Liberian applications the Committee should not proceed with a discussion of matters pending before the International Court. On the grounds of sub judice he moved for an immediate adjournment. Canada abstained in the vote which followed because there was no opportunity to consider the important issues involved. The vote against adjournment was 1 in favour (South Africa), 67 against, with 11 abstentions (including Canada, Australia, New Zealand and U.K.). South Africa did not participate in the subsequent debate on the item or in the voting on the various resolutions. In plenary, when the sub judice argument was again invoked by South Africa, we voted against the motion for adjournment because we had come to the conclusion that the rule could not be relied upon to exclude all discussion under the item (e.g. the U.N. supervisory functions were not affected by the action brought by Ethiopia and Liberia) and we had voted for 5 of the 6 resolutions adopted in Committee. On this occasion the vote was 82 (Canada, New Zealand)-1 (South Africa)-9 (U.K., Australia).

5. In the early stages of the discussion in Committee several of the Latin Americans (Mexico, Venezuela) toyed with the idea that, under the terms of the mandate, the Union Government would cease to be the mandatory power if there was a change of government in South Africa from a monarchical to a republican form. This idea was really based on a misconception of constitutional law as it affects relations between members of the Commonwealth and, inasmuch as it was a doctrine which called into question the validity of all heads of states agreements concluded by the Sovereign before Commonwealth nations such as Pakistan and India became independent, caused considerable concern to the Commonwealth countries. When these difficulties were explained to Mexico and Venezuela they abandoned any idea of bringing in a resolution on this question. At a much later stage Mexico and Venezuela brought in a very ill-considered draft resolution which appealed to all members of the U.N., 'particularly those having close and continuous relations with the Government of the Union of South Africa," to bring their moral influence to bear on that Government. This was aimed at Commonwealth members but, like the first idea, had not been thought out sufficiently. It was particularly obnoxious to the Ceylonese Representative who pointed out that several members of the Commonwealth, such as Ceylon and Ghana, did not maintain diplomatic relations with South Africa. In the face of the Ceylonese attack Mexico and Venezuela withdrew their draft which, in the circumstances, was the best thing that could have happened. On these two occasions the Mexican Representative, who was one of the most sensible and effective members of the Committee seemed to suffer a lapse of good judgment although his motives were understandable in both instances.

6. Three of the draft resolutions adopted under this item were recommended by the Committee on South West Africa. These were draft resolution I on petitions relating to South West Africa, draft resolution II on political freedom in South West Africa and draft resolution V on the Windhoek disturbances. In addition, draft resolution IV, which invited the Specialized Agencies to undertake urgent programmes to assist the indigenous population in the Territory, was the outcome of views expressed in the meetings of the South West Africa Committee.

7. Of these resolutions, only the one dealing with the Windhoek location gave rise to any discussion. Here El Salvador and Tunisia proposed an amendment which asked South Africa to take steps to prosecute and punish the civilian and military officers responsible for the death of eleven Africans in the Windhoek location disturbances of December 10/11, 1959. The Scandinavian countries attempted to replace the underlined words by the phrase "institute legal proceedings against" which would have been a considerable improvement. Canada supported the Scandinavian sub-amendment which was lost in a very close vote, 27-25 (Canada)-22. The Tunisian-El Salvador amendment was then adopted with Canada, Ireland, New Zealand and the Scandinavians abstaining. We voted against two Bulgarian amendments which were mischievous and tended to call into question the validity of the mandate. Both were carried. The resolution which emerged contained some imperfections of wording; in essence, however, it was intended to express regret at the loss of life resulting from the action taken by the police and soldiers at Windhoek. The Delegation's vote for the resolution as a whole was in line with the Canadian Government's publicly-expressed regret at the tragic situations which have led to the loss of many lives as a result of the way in which the Union has applied its policy of apartheid.

8. The two remaining resolutions were both controversial. Draft resolution III, sponsored by 20 African delegations, went beyond what was needed in a resolution whose purpose was simply to take note of the legal action brought by Ethiopia and Liberia. The original draft of this resolution would have been more acceptable to Canada, New Zealand, Netherlands and the Scandinavians who nevertheless decided to vote for the main intent of the resolution. In its final form this resolution contains a phrase which "finds that the Government of the Union of South Africa has failed and refused to carry out its obligations under the Mandate for the Territory of South West Africa." We would probably have abstained if a separate vote had been called on this paragraph. In their desire to get strong resolutions the African-Asians overlooked the persuasive value of resolutions which all members of the Commonwealth, apart from South Africa, could have supported.

9. Draft resolution VI raised a number of complications and in calling for the Committee on South West Africa to go to the Territory to investigate and report back to the Assembly went beyond the supervisory functions exercised by the League which have been inherited by the United Nations. Doubts in regard to the appropriateness and practical value of this recommendation were voiced by Ireland, a member of the S.W. Africa Committee, and were also shared by India which proposed a number of amendments designed to improve the text.

This was one of the few occasions when India showed a readiness to moderate the language used in draft resolutions coming before the Fourth Committee. While some of the Indian amendments were accepted by the 11 co-sponsors the crucial one, which would have changed operative paragraph 4 in such a manner as to leave the South West Africa Committee with complete discretion as to the means it might adopt, was not. We therefore abstained on the resolution as a whole in the company of Ireland, Austria, Finland, Japan, Greece, Netherlands, New Zealand, Australia, U.K., and U.S.A. In many ways the key votes were those on operative paragraphs 2 and 3. Canada and New Zealand voted in favour of the adoption of these paragraphs.

The Canadian Position

10. Canada voted for 5 of the 6 draft resolutions adopted on South West Africa, abstaining on draft resolution VI. New Zealand followed a similar course and, with Canada, voted for operative paragraphs 2 and 3 of draft resolution VI. The votes of both countries reflected a desire to move with the changing times in Africa, to support resolutions aimed at improving the lot of the people in the Territory and opposition to the South African policy of apartheid. In contrast Australia and the U.K. voted only for the resolution dealing with assistance by the Specialized Agencies, abstaining on the remaining five resolutions.

11. Apart from general policy considerations the Canadian Delegation had been instructed to vote with the African-Asians on minor issues and, where abstention was felt to be justified, to abstain in "good company" i.e. Ireland, the Scandinavians and other moderate non-administering countries such as Greece and Austria. Canada voted with the Scandinavians on every issue except the vote on draft resolution VI as a whole. The Scandinavian affirmative vote on this resolution (apart from Finland which abstained with Canada) was primarily a political decision: because of South African attacks on Norway and Sweden they were unwilling to cast any vote which could be interpreted as implying support for South Africa even in an indirect fashion.

Recommendation for Future Action

12. This item will reappear on the agenda of the resumed session because of draft resolution VI, which contains a paragraph asking the Committee on South West Africa to make a "preliminary report" on the implementation of this resolution. Since South Africa is unlikely to admit the Committee to the Territory it is possible that the anti-colonials will introduce even more extreme resolutions when the item comes up for discussion. At the first part of the fifteenth session U.K. Representatives urged South Africa to make some gesture of conciliation, perhaps by inviting a representative of the South West Africa Committee to visit the Territory. The South African Government was unwilling to make any gesture of this kind and it remains to be seen whether the Secretary-General, who has been asked in a rather ambiguous phrase in draft resolution VI to "provide facilities for the execution" of this resolution, will be able to make any headway with the South African authorities.

13. For future Canadian policy the votes on the resolutions deprecating the application of the policy of apartheid in South West Africa are of most significance. The key vote here is the roll-call vote in plenary on operative paragraph 3 of draft resolution VI. Canada voted for this paragraph on which there were only three abstentions — Australia, Portugal and the United Kingdom.

14. In preparing future instructions on this and the apartheid item it should be remembered that Canada is now on record as voting in favour of:

(1) A resolution which: (a) considers that the apartheid policy applied in South West Africa is contrary to the terms of the Mandate, the U.N. Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights; and (b) considers that the application of the apartheid policy is prejudicial to the maintenance of a peaceful and orderly administration in the Territory [Draft resolution V on the Windhoek location].

(2) A resolution which: (a) notes with grave concern that the administration of the Territory, in recent years, has been conducted in a manner contrary to the Mandate, the U.N. Charter, the Declaration of Human Rights and the resolutions of the General Assembly; and (b) "finds that the Government of the Union of South Africa has failed and refused to carry out its obligations under the Mandate" [Draft resolution III — no separate votes were taken on the preambular or operative paragraphs but Canada would probably have abstained if a separate vote had been taken on the wording in (b)].

(3) Paragraphs which: (a) deplore and disapprove of the policy practises by South Africa contrary to its obligations under the Mandate for South West Africa; and (b) deprecate the application, in the Territory of South West Africa, of the policy of apartheid, and call upon the Union Government to revoke or rescind immediately all laws and regulations based on that policy [Operative paragraphs 2 and 3 in Draft resolution VI, both adopted by roll-call votes].

CHINESE REPRESENTATION AT THE UNITED NATIONS

Dear Sir:

The result of this year's voting on the United States' moratorium resolution concerning Chinese representation at the United Nations[100] once again raises the question of what future Western policy in this connection should be, but the closeness of this year's vote has lent an urgency to the question which has hitherto been lacking. Naturally, the Communist Chinese are representing the decline in support for the U.S. moratorium resolution as a favourable development for Communist China and an indication of impending defeat for the United States and it must be admitted that, in terms of simple mathematics, the United States appears to be fighting a losing battle. Although the newly elected African members, for the most part, abstained on the question this year, it is unlikely that they will all do so again after finding their United Nations feet. For this reason alone — and there are other compelling reasons — it is imperative that urgent consideration be given to Western tactics over Chinese U.N. representation before the issue arises again in the General Assembly.

I do not intend to go into all the ramifications of Chinese U.N. membership or diplomatic recognition of Communist China, with all the legal and other arguments for and against which have been covered admirably in various memoranda in recent years in the Department (the latest of which on our files is dated June 11, 1958). However, it appears that there are a number of considerations which have become more valid with the passage of time and it is with these that this letter is concerned. In the first place, agreement to discuss Chinese representation at the United Nations is not the same thing as the admission of Communist China to the Chinese seat, although it must be admitted that probably most of those nations opposed to the moratorium on discussing Chinese representation would also vote for Chinese Communist admission to the U.N. Secondly, even a vote favourable to seating Communist China would be a long way from Communist Chinese acceptance. In present circumstances with the United States supporting Chiang Kai-shek and the control of Taiwan beyond the grasp of Peking, it is almost certain that Communist China would refuse to take a place at the United Nations. Thirdly, even if a majority of the United Nations voted to seat Communist China, and even if Communist China by some presently inconceivable act, were to accept a United Nations' seat, it is most unlikely that a majority of the United Nations membership would agree to the handing over of Taiwan to Communist Chinese control. The circumstances under which Communist China might accept the Chinese seat at the United Nations would be if Nationalist China withdrew from the Organization following a vote favourable to the seating of the Communist Chinese, although this is by no means certain since the United States and Chiang Kai-shek could still defy Communist China and maintain the independence of Taiwan and, thereby, the existence of two Chinas.

Bearing the above three points in mind, it appears that a number of positive advantages could be derived from inviting Communist China to take a seat at the United Nations. In the first place, as noted above, Peking would almost certainly decline such an invitation while Taiwan remains beyond its grasp and under U.S. protection. The advantage, from a Western standpoint, accruing from such a situation is that it would approximately reverse the roles of the United States and Communist China in placing the latter on the defensive over this question. Instead of the Americans being accused of unreasonableness by their stubborn attitude, the opprobrium would be transferred to the Chinese. There would be the added advantage, in the unlikely event of Communist China accepting a U.N. seat, of ipso facto throwing the Communist Chinese and the Russians together, thereby exacerbating existing Sino-Soviet differences. While the Soviet Union today has a free hand to act as it wishes in the United Nations, Communist Chinese membership would force the two Communist giants to co-ordinate their policies — a task which is likely to be at least as difficult as coordination amongst the Western powers. Furthermore, with the Communist Chinese in the United Nations, the Soviet Union in some circumstances might well exert a restraining influence upon them. An additional, but important, advantage to be derived from Communist Chinese membership in the United Nations would be the removal of one of the serious strains bedevilling relations between the Western democracies on the one hand, and most of the Afro-Asians — both neutralist and Western oriented — on the other.

One major problem, of course, regardless of any action on Communist Chinese recognition or U.N. representation by other countries, remains that of getting the Americans off the hook on which they have impaled themselves and, to a lesser extent, their allies and friends. This problem may be slightly more susceptible to solution by virtue of the recent China vote in the United Nations than it has been in the past, if the Western powers are willing to go to work on it. Over the next twelve months it would seem worthwhile for the allies of the United States to exert whatever influence they may have, to bring about a change in American China policy insofar as the United Nations is concerned. It is doubtful if even a new United States president and government will be willing to depart very far from the present American policy on China. Perhaps the best that could be hoped for — and should be worked for — next year is that the Americans be persuaded to forego their annual moratorium resolution, thereby permitting a United Nations debate on the Chinese representational question. This would remove one of the serious complaints of many Afro-Asians who deplore U.S. efforts to prevent even a discussion on the subject but who might not take such umbrage at mere U.S. opposition to Communist Chinese representation during a debate on it. Furthermore, a defeat for the moratorium policy in the General Assembly — which seems inevitable before long — would be more damaging to American prestige and influence than the minor climb down that the abandonment of the moratorium policy would represent. No one could expect the United States in the next year to reverse its established stand on opposition to Communist Chinese U.N. membership. However, if the Americans could be persuaded to agree to drop their moratorium resolution and to participate in a debate on the question, then whatever remaining influence their allies have would be required to persuade the United States to accept with reasonable grace a vote which could well favour seating the Communist Chinese in the United Nations. While the Americans could not be expected to approve of such action, if they could be brought to accept it gracefully as the will of the majority arrived at democratically, honour would be satisfied and they would be off the Chinese representational hook.

In the course of the process described above, there would be no need to persuade the United States to stop supporting Chiang Kai-shek and, therefore, there could be no charges in South East Asia concerning an American double-cross. The Americans might still, in fact, have their way because the Communist Chinese are so deeply committed to the recovery of Taiwan and to an anti "two Chinas" policy that they could be counted upon to reject the offer of a U.N. seat prior to a settlement of the Formosa question to their satisfaction. This solution would also have the advantage of releasing those allies of the United States from the increasingly awkward position in which they find themselves in lending their support to the U.S. moratorium resolution. In particular, the position of the United Kingdom in this respect has been most difficult and, in many respects, inconsistent. British support for the American position on Chinese U.N. representation has persistently bedevilled Sino-U.K. relations and will continue to do so while the present situation exists. While other allies of the United States are not in such an unhappy position as the United Kingdom, the situation has been an uncomfortable one and requires a solution in the not too distant future, possibly along the lines suggested above.

Even if the Communists did accept a seat in the United Nations and the Nationalists withdrew in protest, the United States could not be accused of deserting either its principles or its allies. I am aware that Mr. Wadsworth, only a week or so ago, uttered a scarcely veiled threat that the United States might withdraw from the United Nations in the event of a defeat over the Chinese representational question and, here again, it would be the task of the United States' allies and friends to dissuade it from such a drastic and foolish course. All the great powers have, at one time or another, been defeated in the United Nations on important issues — the Soviet Union regularly, the United Kingdom and France on occasion — but all have accepted their lumps and retained their membership. In fact, the election of Communist China to the United Nations — whether accompanied by U.S. acceptance (not necessarily approval) under allied encouragement as advocated above or by direct defeat — appears to be the only way of loosening the straight-jacket in which U.S.-China policy has been clamped in recent years.

I am fully conscious that there is nothing new in the foregoing analysis or in the proposals made; that many of the American leaders still approach this question from an emotional standpoint; further, that I have touched on only one aspect of a complex problem which will require much time and effort to resolve. Nevertheless, it is the most urgent aspect of the China question and requires immediate and continuing attention. While most of the new African states are unlikely to go over to Communism lock, stock and barrel, they are also unlikely to be impressed by American arguments on China. Furthermore, in seeking a fair share of the aid pie, which in its present Western form alone is far too small to go round, they may conclude that their best interests will be served by recognizing Peking and voting for its presence in the United Nations — in the hope of remaining outside the East-West tug-of-war and of obtaining aid from both sides. Another consideration that may well affect their decision in this direction is that in their newly independent state they may wish to start with a clean slate and avoid the appearance of simply taking over the policies of their former masters — regardless of the reasonableness, or otherwise, of such policies and it is doubtful, in any case, if they will consider the American or Western stand generally, as being reasonable where Communist China is concerned.

Yours very truly,
C.J. SMALL

15TH SESSION OF THE U.N. GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Extract from Memorandum by Counsellor, Permanent Mission to United Nations

[New York], July 11, 1961

ASSESSMENT OF THE 15TH SESSION

The 15th session of the General Assembly opened on September 20, 1960, adjourned for the holidays on December 20, resumed on March 7, 1961 and was finally terminated in the small hours on April 22 after an all-night marathon meeting. The session broke several records: it was the largest gathering of representatives (from 99 member states) that the United Nations had ever seen; it had the biggest agenda of any Assembly session (there were 90 items altogether); and it was also the longest in United Nations history, in spite of the fact that it did not succeed in disposing of all the items on its agenda.

In some respects the character of the session changed from the first part to the second part. For example, there was some general improvement in the international climate and the East-West conflict became less sharp in the second part. In at least one respect, however, the session had a certain unity; from beginning to end the impact on the Assembly of the large influx of new African member states was strongly felt. Throughout the session the main preoccupation was with colonial issues and with the various aspects, political and financial of the United Nations operation in the Congo. This was "Africa's session."

First Part of the Session

During the first part of the session the Assembly was dominated by the following features: (a) the renewal of the cold war; (b) the United States presidential elections; (c) the attendance of a large number of heads of state and government; and (d) the admission of a record number of newly independent states, most of them from Africa.

The United Nations faced a difficult international situation when the 15th session opened. The Organization was in the midst of a major crisis in the Congo; indeed the Assembly had just held an emergency special session on that question. There had also been in the preceding months a sharp increase in East-West tensions, which Khrushchev dramatized by his personal attendance at the Assembly.

He evidently came to New York to demonstrate the strength of the Soviet bloc and to reassert his own leadership and that of the USSR in spite of the ideological controversy with communist China. He therefore appeared to be more concerned with his audience at home than with the audience in the Assembly and his main initiatives (on disarmament, Chinese representation, the U-2 incident, reorganization of the United Nations Secretariat and anti-colonialism) seemed designed more to impress his domestic audience than to achieve acceptance by the Assembly. On the question of anti-colonialism, however, he struck an immediate chord of sympathy and achieved a certain degree of success. Even on this issue, however, Soviet leadership was displaced by that of the Afro-Asians.

Khrushchev's blustering behaviour at the Assembly, and the defeat of the Soviet proposals on the Congo and the reorganization of the Secretariat, probably left the Western powers temporarily at an advantage. Before the first part of the session was over, however, the Soviet bloc appeared to have recouped their losses as a result of the following three factors: (a) the tendency of the neutrals to move toward the Soviet position whenever the USSR moved away from the position of the Western powers, and therefore to seek a compromise which, while perhaps far from the most extreme Soviet proposal, was nevertheless such as to allow significant gains to the Soviet side; (b) the neutralists' support of Lumumba and their criticism of the Secretary-General's policy in the Congo; and (c) the lack of leadership on the part of the United States delegation.

There is no doubt that the timing of the United States presidential elections was unfortunate from the point of view of the role played by the United States delegation, and by the Western powers generally, during the first part of the session. It was evident to all that the United States delegation was either without instructions on many important issues or was unable to obtain new instructions on issues where the United States position had already come to be considered by the majority of the Assembly as out of date and ineffective. The result was a lack of initiative and flexibility which put the Western powers and their friends at a distinct disadvantage; they were unable adequately either to counter the Soviet attacks or to give the sort of lead the uncommitted countries might have been glad to follow.

In this situation the attendance of a large number of heads of state and government added greatly to the disharmony, bad temper, and exhaustion that characterized the first part of the session. In combination with the influx of new members and their inexperience with United Nations practices, it was undoubtedly responsible for the fact that the Assembly procedures, already over-burdened by the expansion of membership, virtually proved inadequate to cope with the burden of business placed on this session.

The Role of the Canadian Delegation

The Canadian delegation and other friendly delegations with which it worked found themselves in a particularly difficult position at the 15th session. They tried to give full recognition to the opinions of the Afro-Asians and the uncommitted countries on such questions as disarmament, technical assistance, etc. They continually found, however, that they were being out-flanked on the left by more extreme resolutions on which they often had to vote in favour although they did not really agree.

Canada's voting record nevertheless demonstrated what on the whole can be called an independent, forward-looking position. On the other hand, we perhaps did not play as active or articulate a role as we might have if it had not been for the complicating factors described above. There is no doubt that those factors made it more difficult for us to develop a concerted "middle of the road" position that could rally widespread support, or to act in our traditional role as a "bridge" between various groupings in the Assembly. This was demonstrated particularly in connection with the Canadian disarmament resolution. On the other hand, we were able at the resumed session to develop very close and useful relations with the new United States delegation and this relationship itself may hold possibilities for a more constructive role at the next session of the Assembly.

UNEF – POLICY RE WITHDRAWAL

You may recall that as a result of heightened tension along the borders of Israel and the United Arab Republic during February, consultations regarding the safety of the United Nations Emergency Force were undertaken between this Department, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, and our Permanent Representative in New York. It was agreed that an approach should be made to the United Nations authorities and that any discussions with these authorities should be based on the following three principles:

(1) There can and should be no thought of unilateral withdrawal of the Canadian component from UNEF.

(2) The withdrawal of UNEF should be considered only in the event of large scale hostilities which either place the Force in physical danger or render it incapable of discharging the functions assigned to it.

(3) There can be no question of using the Force in any active combat role.

It was further agreed that the approach to the United Nations should be in two stages. The first step would be a conversation between Mr. Charles Ritchie and Dr. Bunche for the purpose of obtaining confirmation from the Secretary-General's office of the existence and status of plans for the safety of the Force. The second step would be a discussion between Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Hammarskjöld of the main issues involved in implementing those plans.

Mr. Ritchie accordingly saw Dr. Bunche and from their conversation, during which the distinction was established between redeployment, which might entail limited withdrawal from certain localities, and evacuation, which would mean entire withdrawal from the UNEF area, it emerged, first, that Dr. Bunche assumed that General Burns had turned over to his successor, General Gyani, the redeployment plans which had been drawn up last year. Dr. Bunche did not have detailed knowledge of these plans because they were regarded as being the responsibility of the UNEF Commander. (General Burns did in fact confirm to us independently that such plans had been formulated and that on leaving his UNEF Command he had left them with his Chief of Staff.) Secondly, some provisional planning had been done in the United Nations Office of General Services for evacuation of UNEF from the area by chartered commercial air transport. However, the U.N. Secretariat was careful, for public presentation purposes, to deny the existence of prepared evacuation plans. Thirdly, in the Secretary-General's view, evacuation of UNEF from the area would require a political decision by either the General Assembly or the Security Council. Dr. Bunche also explained that in his and the Secretary-General's view the effective operation of UNEF under its present terms of reference was based on two important principles and that if either principle were jeopardized the problem would have to be immediately referred to the General Assembly or the Security Council. The two principles mentioned by Dr. Bunche were, first, that UNEF could not share occupation of a given piece of territory with other military forces and, secondly, that UNEF should not be used in a combat role. In conclusion, Dr. Bunche suggested, and Mr. Ritchie agreed, that it might be advisable if the Secretary-General were to take the initiative in having these questions discussed informally in the UNEF Advisory Committee.

It is suggested that Mr. Ritchie should now pursue the question with the Secretary-General. His approach would be based on a clear understanding of the three principles set out in paragraph (1) above and would revolve around questions of how and in what circumstances withdrawal and evacuation plans would be likely to be implemented. From the point of view of the Canadian Government, it would probably be desirable to give formality to our approach to the Secretary-General on this subject. Accordingly, an Aide Mémoire has been drafted which Mr. Ritchie could leave with the Secretary-General. The Aide Mémoire is based on one submitted by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, when this subject first came under discussion. The present revision sets out the political principles which we consider should govern the understanding with the United Nations and takes into consideration points made by General Burns and Mr. Charles Ritchie. The text has been agreed to by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff.

Attached for your signature, if you approve, is a telegram asking Mr. Ritchie to proceed with his discussion with the Secretary-General and giving the text of the Aide Mémoire.[101]

UNEF – POLICY RE WITHDRAWAL

Although the situation in the Middle East has again stabilized somewhat since the incidents in early February, we think it would be advisable to carry on with the second stage of plans for seeking an understanding with the Secretary-General regarding responsibility for the safety of the Force. Accordingly we propose that you should now follow up with the Secretary-General your preliminary discussion with Bunche. Your initiative would be on the understanding that the Secretary-General might wish subsequently to raise the question informally in the UNEF Advisory Committee.

2. We agree that it would probably be useful to give the Secretary-General a memorandum or aide mémoire setting out our understanding of the role of UNEF and the arrangements and responsibilities which will apply if the Force should find itself no longer able to function effectively. On the basis of the first draft aide mémoire submitted by the CCOS, and of your reference telegram, we have prepared in consultation with the CCOS a revised text which is set out below. We leave it to you to decide whether it should be left with the Secretary-General

Signed by SSEA 17/5 R. C[ampbell].

when you see him or further revised in the light of your discussion with him and presented prior to the anticipated meeting of the Advisory Committee. Text Begins:

In view of incidents on the Israeli-U.A.R. demarcation line in February this year and as the situation in the Middle East generally remains uncertain, it is considered timely to reaffirm the conditions and terms under which the UNEF was established and is operating. It is the Canadian Government's understanding that these are as follows:

(a) the Force was intended only to secure and supervise the cessation of hostilities and can therefore in no circumstances be considered as capable of undertaking an active combat role;

(b) the Force's withdrawal should be considered only in the event of large-scale hostilities which render it incapable of discharging the functions assigned to it without undue physical risk;

(c) the ultimate responsibility for a decision to withdraw or to curtail the functions of the Force either because of large-scale hostilities or of changing conditions rests with the United Nations acting through the Security Council or the General Assembly;

(d) as long as the Force remains in being, the United Nations are primarily responsible for its safety.

2. It follows:

(a) that there can be no question of unilateral withdrawal of the components of the Force; and

(b) that in the event of large-scale hostilities the Secretary-General would take the necessary measures for the safety of the Force through consultation with the UNEF Advisory Committee and if necessary advise the Security Council or the General Assembly on the need for withdrawal or otherwise.

3. In view of the above, and as the Force can defend itself only against small marauding groups or civil disturbance in the area of supervision, it would seem desirable that there be a plan for ensuring the safety of the Force should large-scale hostilities break out. The Canadian government understands that such a plan may have already been worked out. However, it might be desirable to ensure that any such plan is kept up-to-date as circumstances change. Such a plan should provide:

(a) for the redeployment or withdrawal of the Force to a safe enclave where the necessary rations, water, etc. would be already stockpiled; and

(b) for the evacuation of the Force from the area as a whole should this be required.

In implementing the first stage of the plan, the Secretary-General would use his good offices to ensure that the safety of the Force is not jeopardized and would notify both belligerents of the location of the enclave and of the lines of withdrawal to ensure the safe conduct of the Force to the enclave. The Force could remain there and, depending on the United Nations decision, be ready either to resume its policing duties when the local situation was restored sufficiently to make this possible, or to be evacuated from the Middle East.

4. The Canadian government would appreciate confirmation that its understanding of the terms and conditions governing the operation of the Force is correct. Any detailed matters arising out of the redeployment and evacuation plan would be the subject of consultation between the commander of UNEF and the commander of the Canadian contingent. The Canadian government would of course be ready to consult with the U.N. authorities concerning assistance which Canada might lend to U.N. efforts to protect the Force. Text Ends.

UNEF – POLICY RE WITHDRAWAL

In my reference telegram I reported that Bunche was contemplating discussion of this subject in the UNEF Advisory Committee. However it later became apparent when we tried to follow the matter up that he had overestimated the Secretary-General's willingness to take the initiative himself in raising this politically delicate question. In fact he has made no repeat no move to call a meeting of the Committee on this subject and he is unlikely to make any. I nevertheless thought it advisable to pursue the question with the Secretary-General along the general lines indicated in your reference telegram and have therefore been seeking a suitable opportunity to have a private word with him. That opportunity occurred earlier this week.

2. I handed the Secretary-General a "draft memorandum" embodying paragraphs 1, 2, 3 inclusive of the text given in your reference telegram, explaining that this was an attempt by the Canadian authorities to clarify their thinking about the terms and conditions governing operation of UNEF and the procedures applying in the contingency of redeployment and or evacuation. I said that the Canadian authorities would be grateful to know whether their understanding of these questions, as set forth in the memorandum, coincided with his own. I also invited his comments on whether, and how, this process of clarification could be widened to include other countries contributing to UNEF.

3. The Secretary-General's reaction was forthcoming and helpful. He said that, with respect to the political framework of UNEF's operations, he entirely agreed with our understanding as described in paragraphs 1 and 2 of our memorandum. The only comment he had to make on this aspect was that, although it was of course most undesirable for countries contributing to the Force to consider unilateral withdrawal of their contingents in any emergency involving the Force, there had in fact been unilateral withdrawals under normal circumstances in the past (paragraph 2(a) of the memorandum refers).

4. With respect to plans for actual implementation of a decision to withdraw the Force, however, he was obviously anxious to avoid anything that could conceivable create the impression that he was preparing the way for withdrawal of the Force. He disclaimed any precise knowledge of prepared evacuation plans, although he assumed there were some and we had of course learned from Bunche already that this was the case. However he did suggest that, if we wished to clarify the status of plans for redeployment and evacuation the best way to do it would be to write him a confidential letter on the basis of which he could raise the matter with the UNEF Commander. If we subsequently wished to widen this process of clarification he suggested that the best way might be to speak individually and in confidence with the Permanent Missions of the other countries involved, starting perhaps with the Scandinavians.

5. I should be grateful to know whether such a procedure meets with your approval and whether you agree that I might now address a letter to the Secretary-General as suggested.

FINANCING OF UN FORCES – POSSIBLE REDUCTION OR WITHDRAWAL OF UNEF

The telegram under reference outlines "two possible approaches that might secure a somewhat broader financial support for UNEF and ONUC :" (a) UNEF (and probably ONUC) might be reduced in size in 1961; (b) countries contributing troops to UNEF and ONUC might campaign extensively to secure the support of middle and small powers for the "principle of collective responsibility."

2. On the latter suggestion, we do not wish to comment extensively. One weakness of this proposal, in its present form, is that countries which contribute contingents to either operations (or both) do not necessarily view UNEF financing with the same eye as ONUC financing. For instance, the UAR might conceivably support the collective financial responsibility of UN membership for ONUC, while maintaining the opposite view regarding UNEF. It would be useful to have the Delegation's assessment as to the likelihood that these states would be willing to engage in a campaign of the type envisaged in paragraph 1(b) above. With specific reference to UNEF financing, there is much to be said for a Canadian initiative designed to alter the Arab attitude. (We understand that both DL(1) and your Division are interested in this possibility.) However, we do not think this can be undertaken before some careful preliminary work has been carried out. First, the views of our missions in Beirut and specially Cairo should be sought on the advisability of a Canadian initiative in this direction. If their reaction proved favourable, our Ambassador in Cairo might sound out the UAR authorities informally, at a high level, along the lines suggested in our memorandum of May 10, 1960 to DL(1) Division,† a copy of which was referred to you. Only in the event that the UAR authorities showed themselves receptive should we consider the advisability of raising the matter directly with other Arab Governments (in Beirut, New York or elsewhere). Obviously this type of approach would take time, and would probably not bear fruit before the next session of the General Assembly. Nevertheless, we would not recommend that it be undertaken as a "crash cooperation" to assist in our problems this year; we might merely spoil whatever chances there may be of eventual success.

3. The comments by Mr. Bender, the chief U.S. adviser of the Fifth Committee, on a possible reduction of UNEF deserve close discussion. Mr. Bender hopes that a reduction of UNEF would result in broader financial support for both UNEF and ONUC, since it would encourage the belief that (1) such forces are not "permanent institutions;" (2) and that the overall cost of UN peacekeeping operations would therefore stabilize at an "acceptable" level (on the assumption, presumably, that the creation of new UN emergency forces would be balanced by the decrease and/or winding-up of others). We find this a very doubtful general doctrine. There is nothing to guarantee that international crises will obligingly die down in one corner of the globe, as others arise elsewhere. Any attempt to compel political realities to fit this Procrustean bed would jeopardize UN emergency operations already well under way, without ensuring the success of the more recent one; it might lead to the complete discredit of the UN in a field where its action is at once most vulnerable and most hopeful. Given the interest evinced by the Canadian Government in the performance, by the UN, of international "police duties," we do not believe this type of approach will commend itself here. Admittedly, the cost of emergency forces, and specially the share of such costs to be shouldered by the smaller and poorer nations, should be kept as low as possible. These nations will have to realize, however, that beyond a certain point, they will get from the UN no more peace than they are willing to pay for. The "acceptable" cost of UN operations cannot be arbitrarily set; it can only be as low as consistent with the successful functioning of these operations.

4. Keeping purely to the financial aspect, it is worth enquiring whether substantial benefit could be expected, for ONUC, from a reduction or a withdrawal of UNEF. Economies have been performed, in this and previous years, in the UNEF budget (which has dropped from an initial 25 to 19 million dollars) and perhaps some further minor paring down would be possible without reducing the Force's effectiveness. (You may recall that Colonel Heuchan, until recently CO, CBUME, thought that "the fat had all pretty well been cut off"). These, however, would be small scale economies. If the Force were reduced by half, more substantial sums would be released, but the Force's budget would not necessarily be cut in half. The logistical support for the Force might well have to be roughly the same, much of the equipment might have to remain. In the third hypothesis, that the Force be withdrawn, UN financial requirements would be reduced by eighteen to twenty million dollars a year. In terms of the likely cost of ONUC ($90 million in 1961), is this a critical sum, which might make the difference between success and failure of ONUC? Would all the sums now contributed to UNEF necessarily be transferred to ONUC? This is by no means certain. This being so, we fail to see the logic of putting an end to the UN's most successful emergency force when there is no guarantee that this drastic step would ensure adequate finances for ONUC.

5. On the Middle Eastern political scene, the reduction or withdrawal of UNEF would have a deplorable effect. As you know, the Canadian Government "has accepted the assessment of the Secretary-General that the relative quiet along the Egypt-Israeli border is due in large part to the presence of the Force and that the Force could not accomplish the tasks set for it by the UN with less than its present strength." (Commentary for the Canadian Delegation, XVth Session of the General Assembly; Part I, UNEF, para 3). We believe this view is shared by the main Western powers, including the U.S. authorities, pace Mr. Bender. The UAR would not dissent: Brigadier-General Hilmy, Head of the UAR liaison office with UNEF, expressed the (no doubt UAR official) view that UNEF could not be reduced further without failing in its task; and that its withdrawal could not take place before a political settlement of the root causes of UAR-Israeli antagonism. (Even Israel, despite its official reservations vis-à-vis UNEF, would probably expect the latter's withdrawal, or a large reduction in its numbers, to lead to increased tension in the Sinai). If this widely held view of the situation is valid, arbitrary cuts in the UNEF budget must be firmly rejected: small scale cuts would not seriously ease the UN's financial problem and would involve a risk that UNEF might fail to control the situation in the Sinai; if a really worthwhile slice were taken out of the UNEF budget (say $10 million, apparently the sum Mr. Bender had in mind when he suggested that the combined cost of ONUC and UNEF for 1961 be forced down from the estimated $110 million to $50 million), the Force would be so weakened as to be no more than a glorified observer group. It would be in no position to prevent the cycle of ever-worsening incidents which preceded the Israeli intervention against Egypt in 1956. We can well understand that, for these reasons, the UN Secretariat would prefer that UNEF be replaced by an observer group, rather than made into a travesty of an international Force.

6. More immediately, a proposal to reduce significantly or to withdraw UNEF would precipitate a wide-ranging and damaging debate of Arab-Israeli issues in the General Assembly. The tangled issues of Gaza and the Straits of Tiran, which occasioned heated controversy in February and March 1957, would have to be reconsidered. Much of the ground gained through UNEF occupation of Sharm-al-Sheikh and UNEF presence in Gaza would probably be lost. As you know, the issue of Israeli navigation through the Straits of Tiran, quiescent at present, is potentially one of the most explosive ones in the Middle East.

7. Finally, to emasculate or disband UNEF might represent only a short term economy. The UN would not thereby be relieved of its responsibility for keeping the peace in the area. If Middle Eastern security is allowed to break down, it may prove much more expensive to pick up the pieces afterwards.

8. We understand that you wish to seek the views of the Department of Finance (and perhaps also of the Defence authorities) in this matter. Nevertheless, such grave issues are involved in the proposal to reduce UNEF that you may find it advisable to inform our mission in New York, without delay, of the initial reaction in this Department to such a possibility.

FUTURE OF UNEF

I regret the delay in commenting on the question raised in Candel New York's reference telegram as to whether possible advantages of reducing or removing UNEF in order to assist in obtaining adequate financing for UN military operations in Congo would offset disadvantages which might be incurred in Middle East.

2. I discussed this problem very informally (without referring to USA representative's view) with Colonel Millen, Chief of Staff of UNEF and am reporting the main points that emerged in my immediately following telegram.† I have also discussed the matter informally with Ali Sabri, and am reporting what he said about the UAR attitude in a third telegram.† In a fourth telegram,† which should also be read in conjunction with this message, I am discussing the situation in Jordan, and views thereon expressed to me in recent conversations with Ali Sabri, Heikal, and Anwar Sadat. In this message I shall outline my own views about the future of UNEF.

3. In my judgement removing UNEF in the near future, while it would offer certain obvious administrative and financial advantages, would obviate certain dangers, and might have also certain political advantages, would involve accepting a very grave calculated risk with possible far-reaching consequences.

4. In assessing the situation we must I think recognize that Arab-Israeli tension, linked as it is at present with problem of inter-Arab relations and particularly just now with the problem of future of Jordan, remains one of most dangerous and intractable issues in international relations. Fact that borders have been relatively quiet in recent months and that Mid East is currently little in world news should not repeat not be allowed to obscure this. Unfortunately a serious crisis could develop here very quickly. A decision to withdraw UNEF should logically imply a willingness to accept the risk of an Arab-Israeli war. Arab-Israeli struggle is one in which emotions on both sides are deeply engaged, and Arabs in particular are not repeat not always very realistic, so that attempts to predict future course of events by reference to rational self-interest of parties to dispute could prove misleading.

5. I have great sympathy with view that in long term water should be allowed to find its own level. In Mid East I think this means at least that the main Arab countries in this region should be allowed to work out their own inter-relationships without much interference from outside powers. This principle has during the past two years been very relevant to the situation inside Iraq and to Iraq's relations with the UAR. It is I think particularly relevant today to Jordan. One possibility is that some new leadership in Jordan, with King Hussein either eliminated or relegated to the sidelines, might work out a rapprochement and conceivably some form of federal union with Egypt and Syria in a reorganized UAR. Conceivably Iraq itself might become a party to some such enlarged and loosened union. Another possibility, which I think cannot be discarded, is that instead of a gradual development we might suddenly find King Hussein assassinated and a crisis about the future of Jordan precipitated, whether by spontaneous combustion within Jordan or by some action planned in Damascus or Cairo. Alternatively, King Hussein might be overthrown in a coup but escape to appeal for either UN or unilateral UK aid. Personally I think the UK would be most unwise to consider any unilateral intervention in any of these circumstances.

6. I do not repeat not know what Israel reaction might be to any of these developments. I have telegraphed separately (my message 624 November 10)† enquiring about a local report that Mrs. Meir has stated that Israel would not repeat not tolerate any change of régime in Jordan.

7. In the event that Israel should react to an assassination, or change of régime, or fundamentally changed orientation in Jordan by a military move toward the West Bank of the river, there is a great possibility of war between the UAR and Israel, on some or all available fronts. This would create a critical problem for UNEF, and for the Canadian and other forces now deployed between Egyptian part of the UAR army and Israel. It would raise once more the problem which came up last February, and which I reported and discussed in various telegrams at the time (particularly Nos. 226 February 24,† 235 February 26† and 241 March 1†). The anomaly of UNEFs position on only one part of the UAR-Israeli front could prove awkward as well as dangerous, in the event that Israel was the first country to move troops outside its own territory (into Jordan) and if Israeli and UAR Syrian region forces then became militarily involved, particularly as there might be no repeat no certainty or at least no repeat no quickly provable outside responsibility for the assassination or coup in Jordan at the time.

8. It is difficult to speculate in advance about such hypothetical (but I think by no repeat no means inconceivable) developments. The irresponsibility and unrealism of many of the UAR politicians' speeches and press statements about Israel are tiresome and unhealthy, and it might seem tempting, by removing UNEF, to force the UAR to face directly the cold reality of Israeli military strength, in the hope that this might induce restraint and by one means or another lead to a situation where realistic negotiations between the Arabs and the Israelis could be brought about. But though Israel is in my judgment still significantly stronger than the UAR, the latter seems greatly to have improved the efficiency of its forces and we could not be sure that the result might not repeat not be a war, with a real danger of the Great Powers being dragged in.

9. It seems to me that on balance maintaining UNEF might help to restrain or limit a flare-up, or at least gain time for consideration here and for consultation and possible Security Council action, and make less likely unilateral Great Power military intervention in the event of an outbreak of Israeli-Arab fighting. Otherwise there could conceivably be a danger that the USSR, in order to re-establish its position as chief friend and saviour of the Arabs, might in a crisis threaten unilateral Soviet intervention against Israel. Moreover having a UNEF Force in Gaza might make it possible for the UN to take some quick action to re-establish the situation on the Israeli-Jordan border.

10. Quite apart from the above extreme case, there is always the likelihood, were UNEF removed, that tension would build up on the Gaza-Israeli frontier, and that incidents could lead to a chain reaction which could become dangerous if unchecked. There is also the point that Israel has not repeat not recognized the Egyptian-Israeli Mixed Armistice Commission since 1956 and does not repeat not allow UNTSO to be effective on this part of the UAR-Israeli border.

11. Another factor that should not be overlooked is the importance of the little UNEF unit stationed at Sharm El Shaikh, on the entrance to the Gulf of Aqaba. As you know its purpose, which has been thus far successfully achieved, is to prevent Arab interference with the use of that gulf by Israeli and other ships going to Elath. Without the UNEF platoon and with the probable restationing there of UAR guns, Nasser might find it difficult to resist needling by King Hussein, Kassim, or King Sihud, and might try at some stage to stop such Israeli shipping. Israel has said (and probably means) that she would treat any such interference as an act of war.

12. In my despatch 283 May 17[103] I reported that the UAR attitude toward Israel seemed to have hardened seriously, and that there had been a significant worsening of UAR relations with Jordan. Since I returned to Cairo this autumn it is more than ever my impression that both these trends are serious and have continued. There is some reason to think that the UAR expects and now really wants a change of régime in Jordan and may be prepared to accept risk that could be involved in consequent possibility of Israeli intervention.

13. I do not repeat not feel I should express firm views on the implications of any significant reduction in UNEF strength (as opposed to withdrawal), but in my next telegram† I report Colonel Millen's views which seem reasonable to me. Moreover it is arguable that there is some real advantage in maintaining in being in the MidEast a UN Force large enough to allow at least temporarily and quickly the detachment of men for emergency use elsewhere in the world, in view of the continuing difficulty of organizing a permanent UN stand-by force. For example the UN Congo operation could not repeat not have been mounted so quickly in the emergency there had not repeat not Mr. Hammarskjöld been able to draw on UNEF. Another emergency could arise suddenly in Jordan or elsewhere.

14. Against the whole background it is my reluctant judgment that the wise course would probably be to leave UNEF as it is for the time being.

UNEF – POLICY RE WITHDRAWAL

You will recall that the Secretary-General, having verbally confirmed the Canadian Government's understandings as set out in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the "draft memorandum" you handed him, suggested a confidential letter from the Canadian authorities as a basis on which he could raise with the UNEF Commander the question of the present status of redeployment and evacuation plans. Because of the Congo crisis, which erupted shortly after your talk with the Secretary-General and which, together with other issues arising out of the Fifteenth General Assembly, confronted the Secretary-General with overriding preoccupations, this third step towards clarification of the withdrawal situation has been left in abeyance.

2. However, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, has now requested that we proceed along the lines suggested by the Secretary-General. The CCOS considers it essential that we be officially informed of the nature and status of measures which the U.N. is presumed to have in hand regarding the safety and removal of the Force in circumstances which would call for such steps. This information is considered necessary in order that the Canadian military authorities will be able to determine what, if any, planning it would be essential or desirable to undertake.

3. Although the situation in the Middle East at the moment does not give cause for more than usual concern, neither does it show any trend towards stability. For example, differences between Jordan and Syria, and likely Israeli reactions to a possible change in the tenuous internal status quo in Jordan, are questions which keep the pot boiling. For this reason, although the time may not be too propitious for a further approach to the Secretary-General on his question, we are inclined to agree that an attempt should be made to obtain from the U.N. a record of arrangements regarding the safety of UNEF. Unless, therefore, you see serious objections because of timing or on other grounds, we would be grateful if you would now proceed with a letter to the Secretary-General. As to timing, we understand that the Secretary-General plans to leave New York early in the New Year on a trip to South Africa.

4. We would suggest that your letter need not do more than request, with reference to the draft memorandum" and to your previous conversation with the Secretary-General, information on the nature and status of redeployment and evacuation plans. As the Secretary-General accepted the statements in the "draft memorandum," in particular paragraph 2(b) of our telegram DL-532 of May 18, 1960 concerning the political responsibility of the U.N. In this regard, it would not appear necessary, at least in the context of this enquiry, to attempt to elicit a statement of his views on conditions which would surround implementation of a decision to withdraw the Force. The essential consideration at this stage is to have official confirmation that the responsible U.N. authorities are prepared for the eventuality of redeployment and withdrawal and to have an up-to-date description of the plans which have been developed.[104]

UNRWA — CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION OF FLOUR

The results of the ad hoc pledging conference reported to you in our letter under reference, as they concern UNRWA, raise once again for the Agency the problem of finding sufficient funds to meet its approved budget.

2. The only source from which the Agency can foresee an increased contribution is Germany. However, on the basis of German increases to other extra-budgetary funds, it is unlikely that the increase will be much more than about 20%. It is therefore the Agency's expectation that about the same situation as last year will prevail, the German increase being offset by the slightly higher level of the 1960 budget. In these circumstances the Agency has made informal inquiries as to whether a possibility exists that the Canadian Government might approve a further gift of flour for 1960, of the same order as in 1958 and 1959.

3. In our view, a donation of about 20,000 tons of flour to the Agency should be given very serious consideration. The General Assembly has reaffirmed its responsibility for the Palestine refugees and has continued UNRWA in being to discharge this responsibility. The Arabs supported a resolution which contained provisions for improvement of the Agency's legal position as well as for revision of the relief rolls. The Agency has thus the blessing of the host governments for a more orderly life in the next few years. However, no express provisions were made for an improvement of the Agency's financial position.

4. Without some substantial increase in contributions, the Agency will inevitably find itself in serious financial difficulties which will lead to curtailment of the rehabilitation projects which have been included, on a slightly increased scale, in the 1960 budget. It would be a pity if these projects were to be curtailed, since they offer to at least a small number of the refugees almost the only opportunity of becoming independent of relief. The Government of Jordan has opened itself to no little criticism from other Arab governments for its realistic approach to the rehabilitation program for the refugee. If funds are not forthcoming, this helpful attitude will be wasted.

5. Another consideration is that World Refugee Year will continue until June 1960. Canada has made substantial contributions to the Year already,[105] but it would be difficult for us to explain if less were done this year than last year for the Palestine Refugees. We are aware that before the official start of World Refugee Year, last year's gift of flour was linked to the Year. However, in general, the High Commissioner for Refugees has benefited greatly from the Year, while there has been markedly less inclination to make an effort for the Palestine refugees.

6. In addition to raising the specific question of a Canadian contribution to the Palestine refugees for 1960, we should also like to put forward for your consideration the suggestion that this and future Canadian contributions to UNRWA might best be made up entirely of flour, at a level higher than the 1959 contributions of cash and flour combined. As you know, the basic ration distributed by the Agency consists of wheat flour, of which the Agency requires about 100,000 tons annually. The sum that we have in mind for the Canadian contribution is $3 million worth of flour, or about 40,000 tons, 40% of UNRWA's annual requirements.

7. In 1959 the Canadian Parliament voted an expenditure of $25 million for disposal of surplus wheat or flour; $13.5 million went via the Colombo plan, $1.5 million to Palestine refugees and $10 million was voted for wheat to be given to a NATO food bank. In spite of the partial loss of some 100 million bushels of wheat of the 1959 crop through early and heavy falls of snow, it is not unlikely, on the basis of the figures we have seen here, that there will again be wheat available, for the disposal of which Parliament might be willing to grant funds.

8. It is suggested that such a Canadian contribution in kind should be at a level higher than our previous contributions of cash and flour combined not only to meet the Agency's requirement for an increase in contributions in order to carry out its responsibilities, but also in order to counterbalance certain difficulties which a contribution wholly in kind would otherwise create for UNRWA. Under the present arrangements, UNRWA has agreed to purchase 50% of its flour requirements in the United States. The rest is brought mainly in Europe, on a purely commercial basis, at a cost about 30% below the North American price. To the latter must be added the shipping costs, which the Agency has to bear. Without any cash contribution at all, and the contribution being maintained at the 1959 level of flour and cash combined, we have calculated that there would be a net loss of assets to the Agency. Thus conversion of the Canadian contribution entirely into kind must entail an increase in the level of the contribution.

9. The practical advantages of a contribution in kind, of flour, would be:

(a) The sum voted by Parliament for this purpose would be spent entirely in Canada;

(b) The contribution would assist in reducing the wheat surplus, with its storage costs, special payments, etc., in a very good cause;

(c) A higher contribution by Canada would be matched, in cash, by the USA on a 70/30 matching formula;

(d) More cash would become available for the rehabilitation schemes;

(e) The flour required by UNRWA is of a relatively low grade, No. 5, a grade less salable than the better quality flours.

10. Against these must be weighed the fact that, in absolute terms, Canada would be making a higher contribution and would be very high on the list of contributors, i.e. the highest per capita contributor and the third highest in absolute terms. The United States contributes $23 million, the United Kingdom $5.4 million.

11. It may not be possible or desirable to consider this proposal for the 1960 contribution, but since the Agency will now be in existence at least 3 more years, you may wish to consider it for 1961 and after. We would, however, recommend that the question of a gift of flour of the order of the two previous gifts be given serious and sympathetic consideration for 1960.[106]

Note du chef la Direction du Moyen-Orient pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, Middle Eastern Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 5, 1960

REMARKS BY DIRECTOR OF UNRWA

This memorandum summarizes remarks made by Dr. John H. Davis, Director of UNRWA, at a meeting on March 30 attended by representatives of the Departments of External Affairs, Trade and Commerce and Finance, and chaired by Mr. Glazebrook.

2. Dr. Davis started by saying that many people in Western countries believe that it is primarily political reasons which have so far prevented the majority of the million Palestine refugees from obtaining employment, and this impression was certainly reinforced by the speeches of many Arab political leaders. He emphasized, however, that economic factors were a much more basic cause of the failure of the refugees to become self-supporting.

3. Developing this point, Dr. Davis mentioned that some 200,000 refugees had managed to find jobs almost as soon as they arrived from Palestine, and had held on to them, and nobody had averred that they were undermining their rights as Palestinians by accepting such employment. Persons in this category, however, were mostly professional or skilled workers. The great mass of the refugees was unskilled labour, since 70 percent of the Arab population of Palestine had been farmers, and the area into which they had moved was already supersaturated with unskilled labour. It was true that Syria and Iraq have a potential for jobs; but it was also true that these countries have had a good deal of unemployment all along, and so it was natural that they had not rushed to open the gates so as to admit a further supply of unskilled labour.

4. Dr. Davis thought that the worst aspect of the problem was the fate of the 300,000 young people who had reached maturity in the twelve years since the refugee problem had been created. These young people did not even have the farming skills and the habit of work of their fathers. They are bright and alert at school, but as they reach maturity, most of their ambition is bound to be dissipated; in other words, a lost generation is arising.

[106] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Jan. 20. Discussed this by phone with ME Division and Econ II. Econ II will raise question with T&C and keep us informed. G.L. M[orris].
Une subvention pour de la farine, d'une valeur de 1,5 million de dollars, a été approuvée par le Cabinet le 28 avril 1960. Une subvention additionnelle de 1 million de dollars a été approuvée le 30 juin 1960.
A grant of flour worth $1.5 million was approved by Cabinet on April 28, 1960. An additional grant worth $1 million was approved on June 30, 1960.

5. Several years ago UNRWA got a fairly substantial sum of money for rehabilitation activities; not all of the projects for which it was used were successful, but among the most fruitful were the two vocational training centres (for plumbers, blacksmiths, electricians, mechanics and the like) established in Jordan and Gaza. This year 300 youths finished their courses at the two centres, and all got jobs. Dr. Davis mentioned that the Secretary-General's report on the refugees (Doc. A/4121 of 15 June 1959)[107] had pointed out that the gross national product of the various countries of the area was growing at an average of something like 4% per year (see tables at end of report). This growth was creating jobs for skilled workers, and the various countries were as yet doing very little to create the kind of skills required. This meant that UNRWA would have the field almost to itself, at any rate for the next four to five years.

6. It was for this reason that the Director was seeking, in addition to regular contributions to UNRWA, a sum of $4 million from the World Refugee Year campaign. If he received the full amount, he would hope to do the following:

(a) set up three or four new vocational training schools — one or two in Syria where the greatest job potential in lands harbouring refugees existed, one in Lebanon, and one in Gaza, where use could be made of the buildings of the relatively unsuccessful Agriculture Training Centre established there some time ago and ruined in the 1956 hostilities;

(b) establish two schools for girls in Jordan, one of which would be for office, domestic and industrial workers, and the other for teachers — for which there was an equally great need;

(c) add another 100 to the 90 university scholarships currently being awarded to refugees each year. (These scholarships are confined to Middle Eastern universities because costs are lower and because it is desired to keep the graduates in the area after their training, in order to help in development.);

(d) provide some additional assistance to the "small grants programme" for individual rehabilitation, which has had some success, particularly in Jordan, although admittedly on a small scale.

7. Dr. Davis said that one of his problems was that many people in the West were under the impression that the refugees were essentially a shiftless lot and that the Arab governments would not let them work even if they wanted to. In consequence, potential contributors often preferred to put their money into what they considered to be a more fruitful activity. But the view of such persons was mistaken; the attitudes of the refugees and governments were not as described and there were indeed great opportunities for UNRWA.

8. With the funds that UNRWA hoped to obtain for vocational centres and the like, some 3,000 people would be trained and productively employed. Dr. Davis was under no illusion that this would alter the statistical dimensions of the refugee problem to any significant extent, but the climate of opinion would, he hoped, be altered, and there would be at least a start in breaking out from the bonds that had held this people stagnant. The real value of the vocational training which was now contemplated would be seen some five to ten years from now.

9. Dr. Davis said it was clear that UNRWA itself could not end the refugee problem; powerful external and internal forces — political, economic and social — already at work in the Middle East would eventually resolve the problem, for good or ill. Sooner or later these forces would put the refugees to work, somehow, in some country; and sooner or later the forces would help to establish some kind of more stable relationship, although not necessarily a better one from the point of view of both sides, between the Arabs and Israel.

10. Dr. Davis commented that the changes which would in the end resolve the refugee problem in one way or another, might be either explosive, perhaps involving a differen ideology, a centrally controlled government, and much greater Arab unity; or might be mor gradual, involving realization of the potential of the present states of the area in independence and as members of the free world society of nations. It was clearly in the interest of al whether they be refugees, citizens of Israel, or impartial observers from outside the area, tha these changes should take place in an orderly manner; and an essential condition — althoug not a guarantee — that the changes should be orderly was a continuation of the activities o UNRWA. Dr. Davis felt that UNRWA's important role in augmenting and supporting stabilit in the Middle East had been clearly demonstrated during the 1956 and 1958 crises in the area during which the Agency had succeeded in keeping the supplies flowing without a break, an had prevented any serious outbreak among the refugees which might have worsened th situation.

11. In answer to a question regarding restrictions placed on the ability of refugees to mov from one Arab country to another, Dr. Davis said that there was some limitation in the Gaz sector, but that even here, refugees could leave if they had training; 250 teachers, for exampl had left to find employment in the Persian Gulf. Lebanon would be delighted to see most of th refugees leave that country, since they were mostly Moslems and their permanent settlement the country as citizens would destroy the delicate balance between Christians and Moslems the country. (The Christian-dominated Government had already quietly given citizenship many of the Christian Palestinians who had come to the country.) There were no particul restrictions on leaving Jordan, where the refugees were full citizens and where over half of t total number of refugees are located.

12. Dr. Davis went on to mention that another mistaken idea which he had frequent encountered was that the Arab host governments were callously not doing anything for t refugees and that host governments had done little to dispel this view. But, in fact, the ho governments provided land, police services, communications facilities and many other forn of assistance. UNRWA had estimated very roughly that the host governments probably spen total of about $10 million a year as a result of the presence of the refugees in their territori this figure was fairly significant in comparison with the $33 million furnished to the refuge from the rest of the world outside the area through the Agency. These figures do not, of cour take account of the sacrifices incurred by the various countries in terms of potential unrest. answer to a question, Dr. Davis expressed the opinion that about half of the estimated $ million was spent on the refugees' behalf, and half merely because they were there.

13. Dr. Davis gave some indication of the basis for his hopes of obtaining $4 million UNRWA vocational training and similar programmes in the context of the World Refug Year. From the United Kingdom it was hoped to raise £5 to 6 million for WRY purposes a whole, and it was also hoped that the £200,000 already promised by the United Kingd Government would eventually be raised to £500,000. The portion of United Kingdom fu allocated to UNRWA would be used in the first instance to set up a vocational training sch in Damascus, (these schools, including three years' maintenance, cost about $475,000) a possibly also the girls' school for office, domestic and industrial workers in Jordan (para 6).

14. In Germany it was hoped to raise DM15 million for the WRY, including 5 million fr the Government, and UNRWA's share of this would permit the construction of a vocatio training school in Lebanon.

15. The Norwegian Government was giving 5 million kronors out of a total of 18 million to be raised in Norway, but Dr. Davis did not say what UNRWA's share of this would be used for.

16. Dr. Davis concluded his discussion of UNRWA's financial problems by saying that he was counting on a school from Canada, and that the Canadian committee for WRY in Toronto was quite optimistic about their ability to raise funds for the project. The school, if built, would probably be located in Syria in the region of Aleppo, where these were better job opportunities than elsewhere. The United Kingdom school (para 13) would be located in Damascus since, if only one school was to be built, the UAR Government had wanted it to be located in the capital of the region.

17. In answer to a question about the problem of rectifying UNRWA ration rolls, Dr. Davis said that there were 70,000-80,000 persons, perhaps more, in Jordan who were illicitly on the ration rolls, and that there were some 120,000 babies and children born since 1957 who were excluded from the rolls by the Agency. If the ration rolls were rectified, there might therefore be as many as 50,000 names added to the rolls. Some progress had been made over a period in the reduction of the number of persons illicitly on the rolls; 46,000 names had been removed in Jordan over a five-year period.

18. Dr. Davis added, stressing the highly confidential nature of the information, that the Agency was now discussing with Jordan the possibility of holding a census, which might consist of two states, the first consisting of merely an enumeration of all refugees and the second taking into account present earnings and similar factors. The Jordanian Government had asked him if the Agency would be prepared to pay a third of the cost of such a census and he had replied that he would seriously consider doing so but that he would agree only if the principle contributing countries indicated their agreement. He also wanted the Jordanians to agree that they would state in public that they had requested the census. UNRWA would then indicate its concurrence a short while later. This arrangement would ensure that there was no possibility that the Agency could be blamed for attempting to launch an initiative to deprive the refugees of their status. The census, if held, would not take place until September or October of 1960, or even later. In any case, he felt that the Agency would have to go slow with the problem; Jordan had hitherto objected to rectification because of the political unrest that it might cause, and maybe the Jordanians were right, since one of the tasks of UNRWA was admittedly to increase stability in the region.

19. Dr. Davis commented that the inequity in ration distribution in Jordan was not quite as great as it seemed, since the clan or village unit was still very important in the social structure of the refugees. This meant that there was a good deal of mutual assistance and exchange among the members of the group; in other words, the viciousness of the situation was mitigated by the traditional welfare system of the Palestinians themselves.

20. UNRWA had found that the clan system could be used to advantage in other aspects of its activities. For instance, there had been some difficulty with the administration of the Agency's small grants programme when individuals who had been settled on new land in unfamiliar social surroundings had often felt tempted to abandon their new life. Now clan or village groups were being settled together and the resulting arrangement was much more stable.

21. Dr. Davis thought that there had been a definite improvement in cooperation with the host governments over the past year, and that this process would be helped by the provision in the UNRWA resolution recently passed by the General Assembly regarding the Agency's privileges and immunities as a subsidiary organ of the United Nations. Person-to-person relations were extremely important in bringing about good cooperation. On the Agency's part, Dr. Davis hoped that there would be a way of breaking the log-jam of back claims against the various host governments, going back in some cases as far as ten years. He thought that UNRWA had been a bit sticky on occasion and he was now having the claims sorted out so that those with importance for the future would be maintained, but those which were of a minor nature and referred only to the past might in some cases be left in abeyance.

22. Concluding his remarks, Dr. Davis placed emphasis on economic development as the real basis for a solution to the problem. The Secretary-General had mentioned in his report (Doc. A/4121 of 15 June 1959, para 10 of annex) that net new investment in the area from all sources in the period 1960-70 would have to total $12 billion in order to create jobs for non-refugees, and a further $2 billion (actually $1.7 billion in the report; para 19 of annex) would be required to create jobs for the refugees; but it might well be necessary to invest the major part of the $12 billion first before much progress could be made with the refugees themselves. (The $12 billion would be investment from domestic savings as well as various capital flows from outside. It will be recalled that the economic part of the report concludes by estimating a capital shortfall of $1.5 to $2 billion to be made good from outside the area in the shorter period to 1965, for both general development and refugee employment.)

23. Aid programmes in the area had hitherto been exclusively bilateral, but perhaps in the future more thought should be given to some kind of multilateral approach. One example of this was the Dillon proposals, concerning the coordination of aid programmes, that had been discussed recently in several Western capitals.

24. Dr. Davis made it clear, in his presentation of UNRWA's problems during the meeting, that his chief purpose in coming to Canada was to seek additional funds, both from the Canadian public (through the Committee for WRY) and the Canadian Government, for the Agency and in particular for the Agency's vocational school construction programme. His request for government aid was made even more explicit in his interview with the Minister. I shall be sending you a separate note about this.†[108]

UNRWA VOCATIONAL TRAINING CENTRE

As reported in our telegram under reference, the UNRWA officials have decided to earmark the contribution received from the Canadian Committee for World Refugee Year and the funds made available through the additional Canadian gift of flour for the construction of a vocational training centre for boys in Lebanon rather than in Aleppo as previously intended. The original plan was to use the West German contribution for the Lebanese centre. However, it now appears that the West German contributions have been delayed and, in any event, are likely to be less substantial than originally expected. Since first priority is to be given to the Lebanese project, the Director has decided to allocate Canadian funds to it and to reserve the West German contribution for a less urgent undertaking.

[108] Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Mr. Ritchie to see. [N.A.] R[obertson].

2. The present objective is to open a Vocational Training Centre in Lebanon in September 1961 and this timetable must be adhered to closely if the whole programme of operations prepared by the UNRWA authorities is to be completed in the three years of the extended mandate period. The plans are not yet finalized; UNRWA is now engaged in negotiations with the Lebanese Government in order to obtain a suitable location. The Agency has two building-sites in mind; although we do not know their exact location, we have been given to understand that they may not be in the immediate vicinity of Beirut.

3. The UNRWA authorities fully agree that the Canadian contribution should be adequately publicized. They have not yet decided how this end would be achieved, but they have in mind proposals such as a reference to Canada in the name of the centre, the installation of a permanent plaque mentioning the role of Canada or something of this kind. Any suggestion from you would be welcome. Needless to say the Canadian Embassy will be invited to take part in the opening ceremonies.

4. It is the Committee for World Refugee Year for the Province of Nord-Rhein-Westfalia in West Germany which has offered to equip a Vocational Training Centre for UNRWA. The Agency would like to take advantage of this contribution since it previously intended to purchase most of the equipment from West Germany. It is realized however that the Canadian Government might prefer that contributions from Canada be used exclusively. The Agency has therefore asked whether you would have any objection to Canada being the largest, but not the sole donor in this case. The officials believe that the necessary equipment is not available in Canada, at least not on such favourable economic terms, but we are not in a position to confirm this point.[109]

CONDITIONS OF THE PALESTINIAN REFUGEES IN JORDAN

According to the Annual Report of UNRWA operations for 1959-1960, the total number of Palestinian refugees is now 1,120,889 of whom 613,743 are living in Jordan. The total population of the country in 1955 was 1,500,000. Allowing for normal increase, it is reasonable to conclude that, by 1960, more or less one third of its inhabitants come from that part of Palestine which is now Israel. Such a high proportion of allogeneous elements would be difficult to absorb in any state. The problem becomes almost insuperable when, as it is the case in the Hashemite Kingdom, the possibilities of economic development are too small to have any hope that the added population could ever live a normal life within the present boundaries of the state.

Seen by the Minister. 12/9/60. [Ross Campbell]

2. However, it would be wrong to imagine that half a million refugees are packed in secluded areas, that they live exclusively on UNRWA's relief distributions or that their sole activity is to wait indefinitely for a problematical return to their former homeland. In fact, while jealously maintaining their identities as refugees, most of them are integrated into Jordanian life and perform a useful activity.

3. The Jordanian Government, alone among the host governments, granted full citizenship to the refugees. The significance of political integration may be doubted, since Bedouin elements still have the upper hand in the country; social integration however is very much advanced. Only 31% of the refugees are at present living in camps. The others have settled throughout the country, particularly in the main centres. While visiting the country at the beginning of October, Mr. Cousineau was told that there was scarcely a village in the country which did not harbour one or more refugee families. The result is that after twelve years the former Emirate of Transjordan has been transformed. The modern Amman (population more than 200,000) has been developed largely by refugees. The two camps near the capital have become for practical purposes wards of the city. Before 1948 the Jordan River was a fairly well accepted international boundary; now the Jordan valley is becoming more and more a unit and former Palestinians may have become the majority of the population in the zone between the valley and the outskirts of Amman where the desert begins. The distinction between peoples originating from the East or the West Bank is still very much alive in people's mind but no longer corresponds to a geographical distribution of the population. Whatever the future holds in store for the state of Jordan, it should be realized therefore that the separation of the East from the West Bank would be almost as painful as the division of Palestine in 1948 since it would involve new divisions between families, friends, business associates, etc. and wipe out the progress made so far in the reintegration of the refugees.

4. Most refugees are now economically integrated. The basic diet distributed by UNRWA is clearly insufficient for the average adult (it does not include any meat) and must be supplemented. All able-bodied refugees have felt compelled to seek some form of employment. Since they continue to receive UNRWA assistance, they are satisfied with much lower earnings than the other Jordanian citizens. They provide therefore very cheap labour force in both rural and urban areas. Only in very large camps located in unpromising areas does one find a substantial proportion of able-bodied refugees still unoccupied.

5. This situation raises the problem of the number of refugees who could manage without UNRWA assistance. The refugees are most reticent about their revenues and no statistics are available. However the Agency's officials are prepared to admit that a good proportion of refugee families, particularly among those not living in the camps, could manage without receiving UNRWA's assistance. As a rule however, the refugees cling to their cards and are claiming all the assistance they can whatever their other means of livelihood. In some areas, this attitude may be a means of emphasizing their belonging to the refugee groups as a social entity.

6. It is a fact that while social integration is going on, all refugees remain conscious of belonging to a special group. They have kept a vivid memory of their former land even in the few cases when they are better off in the new one. It is well known that the refugees are always insisting in their right to return to their 'homeland'; the latest Annual Report for UNRWA activities acknowledges this point once again. How many would effectively return, given the opportunity, is a moot question. But unless some form of settlement of the Palestinian problem is eventually accepted by the bulk of the refugee population their complete integration in the country in which they now live remains impossible.

7. One of the factors which maintains feelings of separateness among the refugees is their superiority complex toward the native from the East Bank. This complex existed long before the Palestinian war and originated no doubt in the days of the Turkish occupation when the East Bank was peopled mostly by nomad Bedouins and a few wretched farmers. The non-Bedouin population of the East Bank increased substantially between the two World Wars and has now reached a standard of living comparable to the Palestinians; it also belongs to the same racial stock as the refugees; but it continues to be despised by both the Palestinians and the Bedouins.

8. Even well-off Palestinians are prone to compare the present conditions of life to the situation in the good old days of the mandate. It is true that the educational standards for instance have deteriorated since the mandate period. We have heard many complaints that students are less fluent in English than their parents. This probably applies to other branches of education as well. The general level of education was fairly high in Palestine during the Mandate but certain classes — particularly the urban people and the Christians — received much better education than the rest of the population. The current UNRWA system enables as much as 90% of the refugees' children to attend school.

9. This feature further helps to transform the traditional Palestinian society, already shaken by the impact of the war. Old customs are breaking up even more rapidly among the refugees than in other Arab countries, but it is still difficult to forecast what form the new society will take. It is noteworthy however that the social transformations have not been accompanied by any marked decrease in morality in Jordan as proven by the low level of ordinary crimes committed among the refugees. (In Lebanon, on the other hand, pretty crimes among refugees are said to be increasing.)

10. The general conditions described above would apply more or less to all refugees groups in Jordan. However, the present mood of the refugee population would appear to differ according to the age groups. Among the older elements (roughly those above 40) some were able to salvage enough capital or were resourceful enough or had a stroke of luck; these have managed to find good living conditions. The remainder, which make up the majority, have not been able to adapt themselves fully to the new conditions; it is unlikely that these will ever live a normal life again. They are completely "désaxés," apparently unable to resume their former activities or learn new ones. They are entirely dependent on UNRWA's care or on the earnings of the younger generation. It is the general consensus of UNRWA officials that they will be in need to receive some form of public assistance for the rest of their life.

11. The situation of those refugees who are now between 20 and 40 years old may be even more tragic. Their normal life was broken at the time when they were about to receive higher education or to start a normal career. While they have usually been able to find jobs and earn some money, they feel that they would have a much better life had they been allowed to remain in their native area. They are therefore most bitter against almost everybody and generally discontented. They comprise the most vocal group among the refugees nowadays and this helps to explain how the general atmosphere appears not to be improving and indeed to be worsening in the last ten years. They are still young enough however to entertain hopes that their situation could improve and may be prepared to accept some form of settlement to this end.

12. The prospects of the younger generation are better. Adolescents have only a dim remembrance of pre-1948 conditions. They have been able to benefit from the educational facilities of UNRWA. The more promising ones have received educational scholarships or are trained in vocational schools; this favoured group comprises of course a small proportion even of the younger population. The other adolescents have less opportunities to improve their fate but they are said to be eager to learn and to have no objections to leaving the country when they believe they can find suitable employment in other Arab states.

13. While the overall situation is rather bleak, the prospects for an eventual solution of the refugee problem are compromised even further by the extent to which prejudices, misconceptions and plain untruths are prevailing among them. One may argue that Communist or Arab-Nationalist propaganda is largely responsible for this situation but after meeting a large number of refugees and speaking to even the more moderate elements one gets the impression that the bulk of the refugees are genuinely convinced and that their feelings antedate the work of any propaganda; it may rather be the case of set opinions which were made up spontaneously to explain away the shock of the 1948 events. The majority of the refugees now profess to believe, for instance, that there was little or no fighting in 1948 and that certainly the Arabs were never defeated; the Palestinian Arabs were tricked or rather betrayed so that once they had evacuated Palestine a truce was concluded which prevented them from going back. Similarly, a good many refugees are absolutely certain that King Abdullah, the grand-father of King Hussein, sold parts of Palestine to the Jews; this feeling is particularly strange in light of the fact that the Arab Legion of King Abdullah was the only Arab army to recover ground from the Israelis in 1948. Most refugees claim as a matter of course that the Western nations and particularly the U.K. and the U.S. are primarily responsible for all the tragedies that have befallen them.

14. These conceptions appear to be so deeply ingrained among the refugees that one wonders whether they could ever be corrected. They affect the whole refugee attitude toward the present régime which is suspect in their eyes not only because it is directed by despised non-Palestinians but also because it is the heir to those accused of betraying the Palestinians in 1948. On the other hand, while a large number of refugees and probably a majority of them condemn the present Jordanian régime in principle, most refugees appear to get on with it peacefully in practice. We have had little occasion to check the popularity of the King among the refugees but we have the impression that the great majority of the refugees are rather passive in this respect. No trouble or sign of emotion was noticed in refugee camps when Prime Minister Majali was assassinated.

15. Conclusion. One may consider the refugee problem from a humanitarian or from a political point of view. Under its terms of reference UNRWA has looked into the problem primarily from a humanitarian point of view. It has done magnificently on this score and the situation of the refugees has improved considerably since 1948. The Jordanian Government appears to have done its share as well. The conditions of the refugees could no doubt be improved further but it would be hard to contemplate the implementation of basic measures which could transform the lot of the bulk of refugee population unless these measures were of a political character. On this score, however, the situation of the refugees has remained stationary in the last twelve years and there is little likelihood of major change in the near future.

16. Meanwhile, a growing number of people are living under unnatural conditions in one of the most unstable areas of the world. Jordan has been irreversibly transformed, politically, socially and economically by the presence of the refugees. These transformations could be said to be desirable, were it not for the excess of population which cannot possibly be integrated in the country. The alternative facing the Western countries is that more than half a million people will be transferred willingly at some time in the future from the present area of Jordan so as to allow the integration of the other refugees or that the West will continue to subsidize all the refugees for an indefinite period.

UNRWA VOCATIONAL TRAINING SCHOOLS

Attached is a copy of a memorandum setting forth Departmental views on the location and equipping of the vocational training schools to be financed by the Canadian Government's donation of $1,000,000. The Minister has indicated approval of the proposals made in this memorandum.

You may, therefore, proceed to discuss in more concrete terms with UNRWA officials their plans for the location in Lebanon of the first of the two schools. You might also use this occasion to express Canadian interest in having the second school located in Syria (without excluding the alternative possibility of a site in Gaza), and to secure whatever further assurance or information may be forthcoming about UNRWA intentions in this respect. We shall appreciate your comments, particularly on UNRWA's proposals for the Lebanese site.

On the question of equipment for the Lebanese school, we would much prefer that this could be provided entirely with Canadian funds (which apparently more than covers the total requirements), or at most with the addition of anonymous contributions. The essential point, in any event, is that the school should be identified as a specifically Canadian donation, and that we would hope to have this explicitly conveyed in the name of the institution.

Should it appear that UNRWA officials would have undue difficulty in allocating the relatively small German contribution other than towards equipment for the school, we would be interested in knowing to what extent they would envisage this as requiring specific recognition on the premises. As mentioned in your telegram number 82 of September 9,† the German contribution would be likely to provide less that one-third of the equipment. It would seem that a contribution of this order might be adequately recognized without detracting from the designation of the school as a uniquely Canadian gift. We shall be interested to have the reactions of UNRWA officials to these views.

UNRWA VOCATIONAL SCHOOLS

In his telegram 68 of August 9† and his letter 431 of August 16 (copies of which are attached) our Ambassador in Beirut informed us that the UNRWA authorities wished to proceed with the establishment of a vocational school in Lebanon. The school building would be financed out of the proceeds of the Canadian Government's gift of flour and the technical equipment worth about $20,000 (100,000 DM) would be paid for out of the contributions of a West German regional (North Rhine-Westphalia) World Refugee Year voluntary committee. The views of the Canadian authorities on this plan were requested by UNRWA.

You will recall that, during his visit to Ottawa last March, Dr. Davis, the Director of UNRWA, estimated at about $475,000 the cost of one vocational school, including equipment and operational expenses for a year. The special governmental donation of one million dollars worth of wheat flour should therefore provide the overall financing of two schools. It seems to us that there would be considerable advantage in obtaining from the start an indication from UNRWA of the proposed location of both these schools. We see no reason why one of these institutions should not be established in Lebanon, where the Government and the population are well disposed towards UNRWA and Canada. However, we wonder whether this site should be accepted "instead of Aleppo," as the Beirut letter has it, unless of course UNRWA no longer wishes to set up a school in Northern Syria (but there is no indication of this). You may recall that Dr. Davis, when in Canada earlier this year, specifically referred to Aleppo as the possible site of a Canadian-financed school. Aleppo is the centre of an economically extremely promising and already wealthy region, and carries much political weight within Syria. It is the business headquarters of the Jezirah area, noted for the rapid development of new land through mechanized agriculture (some Canadian agricultural machinery has been sold there), and destined to further expansion when irrigation works are undertaken on the Euphrates and Khabur rivers. There is much to be said for making Canada's name known there through a technical school: we should reap benefits in terms of political goodwill and perhaps even of trade advantage. If we renounce this site, we suspect UNRWA will have no difficulty in finding another sponsor. One other school site UNRWA has in mind, Gaza, might prove of interest from the Canadian point of view, because of our participation in UNEF.

The second question raised by UNRWA's enquiry relates to the proposed purchase by UNRWA of the technical equipment for the school out of West German voluntary donations. In this connection, the following considerations would seem to apply: (a) the German funds represent voluntary contributions, not a (possibly "promotional") offer from a German industrial concern; (b) it is desirable that all possible contributions to UNRWA, even relatively small, should be used and encouraged; (c) on the other hand, the Canadian and German (100,000 DM) contributions in this case are not commensurate, and (d) it is desirable in Canadian terms that the school be clearly recognizable as a strictly Canadian donation. Perhaps these facts and requirements can be reconciled if UNRWA were to agree that the school be recognized (and inscribed) as, e.g., "UNRWA Technical School — Gift of the People of Canada," or possibly "Lebanon-Canada Technical School — UNRWA." The German donation might be adequately recognized through a modest plaque or plaques, in the workshop(s), indicating that the technical equipment of the school were a gift of the German WRY committee of North Rhine-Westphalia. Nevertheless, it would of course be preferable if the equipment were purchased out of Canadian or "anonymous" UNRWA funds.

I should like your approval to:

(1) Discuss with UNRWA officials the location of the two "Canadian" schools, lending our tentative support to establishments in Syria and the Lebanon without, however, excluding the possibility of the Gaza site;

(2) Give UNRWA a clear indication that we should prefer the schools largely financed by Canadian funds to bear a uniquely Canadian label of origin and that we think the relatively modest German contribution involved might be devoted to some other useful purpose.[110]

UNRWA VOCATIONAL TRAINING CENTRES

UNRWA authorities are still discussing exact location of Lebanese vocational training school with local authorities. They are planning to locate second Canadian school near Aleppo but Gaza remains a possibility.

2. UNRWA authorities have learned that funds to be received from Canadian Committee for World Refugee Year will amount to 241 thousand dollars. Total Canadian assistance (i.e. WRY contribution plus Canadian government donation) will therefore cover more than cost of two above mentioned schools. Intention [of] UNRWA is to use surplus for girls vocational school in Jordan. Funds from UK and perhaps Australia will also be allocated this school in Jordan.

3. Germans have made no repeat no request for publicity in connection with their offer of technical equipment. UNRWA plans to identify school as specific Canadian donation and not repeat not to recognize German contribution in premises except for name of company on the equipment. Since UNRWA will purchase European equipment in any case, acceptance of German equipment for Canadian schools should not repeat not further impair designation of schools as uniquely Canadian gifts. This seems to meet your wishes.

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR — EXTENSION OF THE PROJECT FOR THE ADMISSION OF TUBERCULOUS REFUGEES

On the basis of the latest estimate, it appears that the Federal Government's expenditure for the treatment and rehabilitation of the one hundred tuberculous refugees and their families will not exceed $225,000 during the initial year (explanatory statement attached). The maximum [111] Voir « Secours aux réfugiés de Palestine », Affaires Extérieures, vol. 13, n° 9 (septembre 1960), pp. 307 à 310.

See "UN Relief for Palestine Refugees," External Affairs, Vol. 13, No. 9 (September 1960), pp. 303-305.

amount authorized for the first year was $600,000, approved by Cabinet on September 11, 1959.

In these circumstances the question arises whether consideration might be given to extending the programme. The following possibilities might be considered (subject to discussion with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the provinces):

(a) Probably additional cases of families with one TB patient could be admitted. It would be necessary to consult at the outset with the High Commissioner for Refugees, who would be warned that the additional cost to the Federal Government of an extension of the programme would keep total expenditure within the $600,000;

(b) If the available number of additional families with one tuberculous member did not use all available funds, consideration might be given to the inclusion of a few families with more than one member afflicted by tuberculous;

(c) Similarly, a few unmarried persons suffering from tuberculosis might be included.

(d) Should it appear that there are not enough suitable refugee families containing tuberculous cases for selection within the extended programme, consideration might be given in consultation with the High Commissioner for Refugees to the selection of a number of families containing members who have some other handicap. A number of refugees suffering from miscellaneous handicaps have been settled in such countries as New Zealand and Australia at relatively little cost.

Statements which have been made by a number of provincial governments at present co-operating in the tuberculous refugee scheme would indicate that these governments would be prepared to make a substantial contribution to the hospitalization costs of an extension of the project. It therefore seems possible that a large number of additional families could be placed in provincial sanatoria without great cost to the Federal Government.

Recommendation

(a) That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to announce that details of an extension of the tuberculous refugee plan (involving no expense to the Federal Government beyond that originally contemplated in connection with World Refugee Year) are being worked out in consultation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and with the provincial governments and that it is hoped that arrangements may be made for the admission of additional tuberculous cases and possibly other categories;

(b) That the details of the extension be worked out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Ministers of Citizenship and Immigration, Finance and National Health and Welfare and with the provincial governments and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, such extension to be on the understanding that provincial governments would be encouraged to contribute as much as possible to the programme and that the total cost to the Federal Government of both the original programme and the extension during the period ending December 31, 1960, should not exceed $600,000.

contribution to the World Refugee Year would be the admission of about 100 tuberculous refugees together with their families and that the tuberculous patients would be treated at public expense. It was also agreed that the details of the plan should be worked out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Ministers of Citizenship and Immigration, National Health and Welfare and Finance and with provincial governments, on the understanding that the provincial governments and the Canadian Committee for World Refugee Year would be encouraged to contribute as much as possible and that the total cost to the Federal Government during the first year should not exceed $600,000.

The estimated maximum cost to the Federal Government of $600,000 was based upon information available to the Government at that time. It was agreed that selection of the tuberculous refugees to be admitted to Canada should be left to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and it was believed possible that a substantial proportion of the cases selected might be in advanced stages of the disease and would, therefore, require prolonged periods of hospitalization. It was also thought that many of the refugee families, having lived for ten years or more in refugee camps, would require a number of months of public maintenance before they would adjust sufficiently to life outside the camps to be able to accept employment. It was, however, understood that the $600,000 estimate was the maximum which the Federal Government might be called upon to spend in the first year of the project and it was hoped that some reduction below this level might be possible.

By the end of January, most of the one hundred refugee families selected had arrived in Canada and had been examined at provincial sanatoria. It became increasingly clear that the majority of tuberculous cases selected by the High Commissioner for Refugees could be described as "minimal or very mild cases." It also appeared that the majority of families were adjusting to life in Canada more quickly than was anticipated and would become largely self-supporting at an early date. In addition, the provincial governments have agreed to accept a larger share of financial responsibility for the hospital costs of these cases than was expected last September. It now appears that the Federal Government may quite possibly have to pay costs of hospitalization for no more than six tuberculous cases beyond the month of March and that no more than ten refugee families will require Federal support beyond the month of April.

In view of these factors, the Immigration Branch has prepared a revised estimate of the probable cost of the project to the Federal Government up to December 31, 1960. It does not appear that substantial expenditures will be incurred by the Government in connection with this project beyond the end of the calendar year 1960. The Immigration Branch has estimated that, on the basis of the present prognosis for the hospitalized cases and the rate at which the refugee families are becoming self-supporting, the total cost of the programme to the Federal Government to December 31 will be about $190,000. To allow for unforeseen contingencies, the Immigration Branch has suggested that an additional $35,000 be set aside, making a total estimate of $225,000. It therefore appears that the actual Federal expenditure in the initial year will be at least $375,000 less than the $600,000 maximum Federal expenditure agreed to by the Cabinet.[113]

MOVEMENT OF THIRD GROUP OF TUBERCULAR REFUGEES TO CANADA

This submission seeks authorization for the movement to Canada of a third group of tubercular refugees from the refugee camps in Europe.

2. There have been two previous movements to Canada of tubercular refugees. The first group of 344 persons (100 families), of whom 100 suffered from tuberculosis, came to Canada during December, 1959 and January, 1960. The second group of 209 persons (39 families), of whom 111 suffered from tuberculosis, came to Canada in July and August of this year.

3. The refugees who came to Canada in the two previous movements have been even more successful than it was expected that they might be, in adjusting themselves to the Canadian environment and becoming established in this country. The majority of them are on their way to becoming self-supporting. June 1960 marked the end of the World Refugee Year, and, in this context, Canada's contribution to the lessening of the problem of the handicapped refugees has been much appreciated here and abroad.

4. Because of relatively rapid settlement of the two previous groups of tubercular refugees, it is expected that a substantial portion of the $600,000 special fund, which was set aside to meet their expenses, will remain unspent this fiscal year. It is expected that this portion, once the financial encumbrance owed to the Department of National Health and Welfare has been deducted, will be in the neighbourhood of $190,000.

5. Preliminary inquiries as to the number of tubercular refugees who remain in the European refugee camps have been made by officials of the Departments of External Affairs and Citizenship and Immigration. We understand from the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees in Geneva, that there are available, particularly in Germany, enough tubercular refugees to make possible the movement of a third group to Canada during this fiscal year. As Canada has already made so substantial a contribution to World Refugee Year, this would be an opportunity to utilize the experience gained by continuing its efforts to alleviate the refugee problem. If Canada can make another humanitarian effort this year, it will go some considerable way toward reducing the numbers of handicapped refugees who must still live in the European camps. It is anticipated that the third group would have about a hundred tubercular refugees, and with their families might involve between two and three hundred persons who would come to this country. Judging from our experience with the other two groups, it is thought that this might result in an over-all expenditure of approximately $130,000.

It is Therefore Recommended that authorization in principle be given to consult with the provincial governments and with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, with a view to implementing the movement to Canada of a third group of tubercular refugees, the initial expenses for which (covering transportation costs and initial incidental expenses of approximately $70,000) would be made from the unexpended portion of the $600,000 special fund.[114]

GATT 16TH SESSION

Following from Canadian Delegation to Paris Trade Committee. On initiative of Wyndham White discussions were arranged yesterday with Executive Secretary Royer, Americans and ourselves concerning various GATT matters. Americans present included Mann, Leddy and Hadraba.

2. Following major issues which will be coming up at 16th Session were discussed:

(i) Rome Treaty. Present provisional agenda for 16th Session envisages a voluntary statement by the Six regarding general developments in Common Market. There is no repeat no separate item requiring the Six to report on specific aspects of Rome Treaty in accordance with procedures of paragraph 7 of Article XXIV of GATT. As far as agriculture is concerned, in view of restrictive aspects of proposals of Common Market Commission and the real possibilities that what might emerge from further consultations among the Six regarding EEC agricultural policy will be even more restrictive of trade, the feeling was that it would be most important for Contracting Parties to conduct a substantive discussion of this aspect of EEC arrangements at 16th Session. Failure to do so would leave the impression that Contracting [114] Approuvé par le Cabinet le 14 décembre 1960./Approved by Cabinet on December 14, 1960.

Parties were not repeat not dissatisfied with the kind of arrangements presently envisaged in proposals of the Commission and an implicit acceptance that GATT rules are not repeat not relevant to trade in agricultural products. Presumably these discussions could take place on basis of present agenda item. (While on subject of agriculture Wyndham White reported that he had received info that consideration was being given by EEC Commission in Brussels to possible need for withdrawing all GATT tariff bindings on agriculture in order to permit application of variable import levies as envisaged in Commission's proposal. No repeat no action would be taken on this until after 1960/61 Tariff Conference because of difficulties this could create for the Six in the negotiations.)

Other specific aspect of Rome Treaty which was discussed related to level of Common Market Tariff. We referred to desirability of including a specific item in agenda of 16th Session on this point. This would be based on reference in report of Committee I (which was approved by Contracting Parties at Tokyo Session) to need for Contracting Parties at 16th Session to consider general level of common tariff in light of paragraphs 4 and 5A of GATT Article XXIV. Wyndham White had envisaged that this could be dealt with in context of forthcoming Tariff Conference. However we indicated that it might be desirable to provide machinery for considering general level of Common Tariff in advance of Tariff Conference and Wyndham White undertook to add this item to agenda, on his own initiative, if on basis of a review of GATT documentation including report of Committee I, he would be justified in doing so.

Regarding acceleration of implementation of Common Market tariff GATT Secretariat are inclined to view that any increases in bound rates prior to their renegotiation would involve a contravention of contractual obligations under GATT. Accordingly, if we were to accept such increases in advance of renegotiations it would be desirable to grant a waiver from these contractual obligations in order to safeguard GATT principle. Royer has mentioned these legal implications to French authorities who had apparently not repeat not taken them into account in putting forward their initial proposals for acceleration. Feeling was that this was an aspect which would need to be put more clearly before European Six in relation to Hallstein proposals. (We of course have already referred in Paris Trade Committee discussions to appropriateness of delaying any increase in bound rates until these were renegotiated but more on basis of procedure than in legal terms).

(ii) European Free Trade Association. Wyndham White referred to procedures for dealing with EFTA Convention in GATT and indicated that he had tried to persuade UK and other EFTA countries not repeat not to seek GATT approval of their convention under paragraph 10 of Article XXIV. He maintains that paragraph 10 is intended to meet minor deviations from principles of a FTA rather than major exception which exclusion on agriculture would involve. Further he feels that to accept exclusion of agriculture from EFTA in terms of paragraph 10 would be a further indication that Contracting Parties are prepared to accept that GATT Agreement is not repeat not relevant to agricultural trading arrangements. On basis of this Executive Secretary's suggestion is that a waiver under Article XXV would be best way of dealing with this lacuna. Such a waiver would not repeat not involve an endorsement of agricultural arrangements of the Seven and in his view these should remain subject to normal GATT provisions.

Regarding bilateral agreements for agriculture as envisaged in EFTA Convention, EFTA countries are apparently not repeat not intending to put these before Contracting Parties at 16th Session. Since however these are a major part of EFTA arrangements Wyndham White takes view that Contracting Parties should insist on having texts of these agreements made available to them as part of their examination of convention.

(iii) Montevideo Treaty. Wyndham White indicated importance he attached to having at least a preliminary examination of Latin American FTA Treaty at 16th Session. He indicated however that he was appreciative of timing problem and in view of our earlier comments had now arranged that procedure for submitting questions should be same as was followed in dealing with EEC and European Free Trade Association. He did not repeat not feel however that Latin American countries would have sufficient time to prepare adequate replies to questionnaire.

(iv) Committee I –Possible Negotiations with Poland. Procedure envisaged by Executive Secretary is that Poles would conduct bilateral consultations in course of 16th Session and if it became clear that a number of countries would be prepared to enter into negotiations with Poland during Tariff Conference, Poland should take initiative in arranging for joint consultations with these interested countries. If a basis is found for Polish participation in Tariff Conference it will be necessary to consider what changes may be required in tariff negotiating rules drawn up by Committee I.

(v) Committee II. Discussions related primarily to nature of interim report that Committee II should make to Session. It was generally felt that this should be confined to a factual report of scope and nature of restrictions maintained on trade in agricultural products which have emerged from consultations which have already taken place and which would indicate serious nature of these restrictions as they affect trade in agricultural products. Longer term conclusions should be left till later in order to have more time to consider them.

One particular problem referred to by Executive Secretary was need for reaching some understandings regarding barriers to trade on agricultural products which would make it possible for agricultural exporting countries to participate in 1960-61 tariff negotiations. It was left that this aspect of problem should not repeat not be referred to in interim report of Committee II but could be brought up in general discussions at time report is referred to the Contracting Parties.

(vi) Committee III. Wyndham White reported that last Committee III consultations were reasonably successful and that less developed countries were reasonably satisfied with progress being made. He referred to Tokyo discussions in which more industrialized countries were asked to voluntarily come forward with offers of any action they may be prepared to take to facilitate imports from less developed countries.

(vii) Market Disruption - Low Cost Imports. Factual study which is being prepared by GATT Secretariat is expected to be circulated to Contracting Parties about three weeks in advance of session. Wyndham White indicated that while this report would add little to what we already know on this subject, it would be useful in carrying forward discussions. He considered that suggestion which had been put forward by USA for a panel of experts would not repeat not contribute to finding effective solutions. He thought that in end it might be necessary to authorize discriminatory measures and this was not repeat not precluded under Article XXIII. What he envisages is a procedure under XXIII whereby countries would consult exporting country concerned with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory settlement. If agreement could not repeat not be reached the matter could then be referred to Contracting Parties and considered by a consultation panel. In his view a procedure along these lines would at least have advantage of requiring countries to make a case before special measures are authorized; and this would rule out unjustified measures. He suggested that it would be useful to consider this line of approach at 16th Session and to establish a working party for this purpose.

(viii) Quantitative Restrictions. It will be necessary at this session to explore best way of dealing with the remaining QRS maintained by countries as they move out of balance of payments difficulties. Italians have not repeat not yet made up their minds on how to deal with their remaining restrictions through GATT although indications are that they may be coming forward with their programme for dismantling them. Dutch also indicated at Tokyo Session that they would be reporting on their programme for dealing with their remaining restrictions. UK however have indicated to Wyndham White that they do not repeat not intend to submit their negative list to Contracting Parties and if countries are to address themselves to remaining restrictions in UK it would be up to interested countries to make a formal complaint. French are intending to take a similar line. In this situation if a repetition of very difficult conflict which arose in relation to German restrictions is to be avoided, agreed procedures need to be worked for dealing with other countries. Executive Secretary is of view that if Italian restrictions were pursued in same way as was done in the case of Germany there would be serious danger of the Six as a group being even less forthcoming in their GATT relations. Two possibilities have been suggested, one is that use should be made of procedures of Article XXIII. In this case however it would be up to individual countries to formally raise matter in GATT forum. Alternative would be to seek a procedure under which the country concerned would voluntarily submit a list of their remaining restrictions to Contracting Parties and this could provide a basis for discussion. This procedure would probably need to be generalized and would require all Contracting Parties including Canada to submit a list of items which are subject to quantitative restrictions.

3. Apart from specific trade issues likely to come up at 16th Session question of GATT organization is becoming increasingly important and urgent. Wyndham White is seriously concerned that unless action is taken without delay to strengthen the GATT organization at a time when proposals are being discussed for a revised OEEC, prestige of GATT in Europe which is already at a low ebb would be further weakened. He has particularly in mind that if USA is prepared to submit to Congress an Organization for Economic Cooperation they should be prepared to similarly to take steps to strengthen their participation in the Organization for Trade Cooperation. At present time he is not repeat not pressing USA to submit to Congress OTC agreement (and Mann has made it clear this could not repeat not be done) but he did raise question of possibility of early definitive acceptance of General Agreement as envisaged under Article XXVI of GATT.

4. As regards 16th Session Wyndham White indicated that he proposed to put forward need for immediate establishment of a permanent executive body for GATT which was discussed at Tokyo Session. He intends to urge strongly that action on this should be taken immediately. Americans seemed to be rather receptive and have undertaken to give serious consideration to possibility of strengthening their representation in Geneva in order to provide a senior USA representative.

5. In view of above discussions Wyndham White is not repeat not planning to visit Washington or Ottawa in advance of 16th Session.

SECRET

TO THE SIXTEENTH SESSION OF GATT

The Sixteenth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade opens in Geneva, Switzerland, on May 16th and is expected to last approximately three weeks. This will be one of the regular sessions to administrate the Agreement and to deal with particular issues arising in the trade field. Matters before this session of major interest include the examination of the convention for a European Free Trade Association, the Montevideo Treaty providing for a free trade area in Latin America and developments relating to the working out of the European Economic Community. In addition, there will be an opportunity to consider the progress being made in the removal of quantitative restrictions on trade, the work being done in relation to barriers to trade in agricultural products, problems arising out of low-cost imports, final arrangements for the 1960-61 Tariff Conference, and proposals for strengthening the administration of the General Agreement.

It is recommended that a Canadian Delegation attend this session and participate actively in its work. It is further recommended that Mr. J.F. Grandy, Director of the International Economic Relations Division, Department of Finance, should be Head of the Canadian Delegation and that the following officials should be included in the Delegation:

Mr. R. Campbell Smith	-	Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. R.E. Latimer	-	Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. J.E. Hyndman	-	Department of External Affairs
Dr. G.J. Dobson	-	Department of Agriculture
Mr. J.R. Downs	-	Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. C.D. Arthur	-	Department of Finance
Mr. H.D. MacDermid	-	Department of National Revenue

In addition, it is recommended that Mr. F. Stone of the Canadian Permanent Mission to the European Office of the United Nations, Geneva, should be attached to the Delegation and that the Department of Trade and Commerce should provide the Secretary.

The Canadian Delegation in their participation at this session should seek to safeguard and further promote Canada's general trading interests in dealing with the various items on the agenda of this session. The Delegation should be guided by instructions to Canadian Delegations to recent sessions of the Contracting Parties and by the following specific instructions relating to the more important items on the agenda of this session.

1. European Free Trade Association

This will be the first opportunity to examine in GATT the proposed European Free Trade Association among the United Kingdom, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Austria, Switzerland and Portugal. The EFTA Convention provides for the elimination of tariff barriers to trade in industrial products among the signatory countries over a transitional period of ten years. The first step in the elimination of tariffs within the area is scheduled for July 1, 1960, when a twenty per cent reduction in tariffs will be made. In addition, quantitative restrictions on trade among the Seven are to be eliminated over the ten-year period while trade in agricultural products are generally to be excluded from this free trade area arrangement, the United Kingdom in agreements with Denmark and Norway has undertaken to eliminate the United Kingdom tariff on imports of bacon, frozen fish fillets and a number of other products from its free trade area partners. Denmark has concluded special agreements on the trade in agricultural products with a number of other members of the EFTA.

The main trade impact for Canada relates to the loss of preferences in the United Kingdom market. The free trade area arrangements will involve the eventual elimination of these preferences vis-à-vis competitors in the EFTA. Canada's preferential position in the United Kingdom market vis-à-vis the United States and other countries not parties to the Convention will not be affected.

Canada could not legitimately object to a free trade area consistent with Article XXIV of that GATT. At the same time it is important to insure that these arrangements should be such as would not involve new discrimination inconsistent with the provisions of the General Agreement and that Canada's interests in the United Kingdom market and the other EFTA markets should be safeguarded to the fullest extent possible. In the examination of the EFTA Convention at this session the Canadian Delegation should be guided by the above consideration and should, if necessary, reserve Canada's position in relation to any of the provisions of the Convention which are at variance with these Canadian objectives. If particular points of difficulty arise the Delegation should seek further instructions from Ottawa. In any case, the timing and nature of any approval to be given EFTA should not be such as to compromise the position of the Contracting Parties in respect of approval of the Rome Treaty.

2. The Montevideo Treaty

In February this year Brazil together with Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, Peru and Mexico signed the Montevideo Treaty for the working out of a free trade area among themselves in Latin America (LAFTA). It is also envisaged that Paraguay and Bolivia may be associated with this arrangement. Signatories to the Montevideo Treaty which are also contracting parties to the GATT are Brazil, Chile, Peru and Uruguay. The Treaty has been submitted to the Contracting Parties for their consideration. Latin American countries have set up a special committee to deal with the GATT examination of the Treaty and a preliminary discussion will take place at the Sixteenth Session.

The Treaty itself provides only the framework for the working out of a free trade area in Latin America and the details are to be the subject of negotiations among participating countries. While it is difficult to anticipate what may develop from this initiative, there appears to be a danger that these arrangements could lead to a preferential trading arrangement in that area falling short of a full-fledged free trade area and which might be prejudicial to Canadian exports to the area.

The Canadian Delegation should indicate its understanding of the objectives of the LAFTA and should participate constructively in the discussions on this item. They should emphasize the desirability of insuring that any arrangements should be such as will ensure the achievement of trading arrangements in Latin America which will promote economic development of the member countries without at the same time impairing trading relations between the Latin American countries themselves and their trading partners outside the area. Only about 10% of the trade of the participating countries is within Latin America; the bulk of their foreign trade upon which their economies heavily depend is with outside countries). Since the details of any free trade arrangement in Latin America remain to be worked out, the Canadian Delegation should explore with other contracting parties the possibility of making arrangements for a continuing GATT examination of the Latin American association as it evolves with a view to ensuring to the fullest extent possible that Canada's trade is not adversely affected.

3. The European Economic Community

The member countries of the EEC will be reporting on developments in the working out of the European Common Market. The EEC countries have now reached agreement on the rates of the proposed Common Market tariff, including the rates for a number of products of particular interest to Canada, including aluminum, synthetic rubber, woodpulp and cod fish. In addition, proposals have now been made by the Common Market Commission for the working out of the agricultural arrangements of the EEC.

It had already been agreed that as soon as the rates for the proposed Common Market Tariff were known there should be an examination by the Contracting Parties of the level of the Common Market Tariff. The Canadian Delegation should explore with other contracting parties the possibility of establishing a special group to carry out a detailed examination of the Common Market Tariff which would provide an opportunity for Canada and other countries to make clear to the Common Market Six what the overall impact of the proposed Common Market Tariff is likely to be on their trade. If there is support for such an exercise, the Canadian Delegation should be authorized to agree to this procedure and should seek to insure that Canada is included in any working party which might be established.

Should the question of the acceleration of the E.E.C. Common Tariff arise at the Sixteenth Session, the Delegation should be guided by Cabinet instructions on this issue approved in connection with Canadian participation at the Paris Trade Committee meeting at the end of March.[115]

The proposals of the Common Market Commission regarding the agricultural policy of the EEC could involve the imposition of severe restrictions against imports of agricultural products from Canada and other outside countries. These proposals envisage in addition to tariffs the continuation of quantitative restrictions on trade and the imposition of variable import levies based on the difference between the price of imported products and the domestically supported prices within the Community. Were these proposals to be adopted, there is serious danger that Canada and other agricultural exporting countries would be left in the position of residual suppliers and imports would be limited to those which are necessary to meet requirements over and above production within the Community. Further, incentives envisaged in the Commission's proposals could result in a sharp increase in production within the Community which would further reduce agricultural imports and result in the development of export surpluses.

In view of these possible dangers for Canada's exports of agricultural products to the EEC (these now account for some 40% of our total sales to the Six) Canada together with the United States, Australia and New Zealand is seeking early informal consultations with the countries of the EEC prior to the working out of their agricultural policy. These consultations are expected to take place late in June this year.

In the light of the above the Canadian Delegation should not press for detailed examination at this session of the agricultural proposals of the Common Market Commission in GATT. From the Canadian point of view the GATT examination should follow the informal consultations arranged for June. However, in view of the restrictive implications of these proposals, it would be appropriate for the Canadian Delegation to take this opportunity to express Canada's concern over the possible adverse effects on Canada's trade, and to remind the EEC countries of the importance of developing non-restrictive arrangements.

4. Quantitative Restrictions on Trade

Substantial progress has been made over the past year in the relaxation of restrictions maintained by most GATT countries for balance of payments reasons. In the discussions of this item at the Sixteenth Session it would be appropriate for the Canadian Delegation to indicate the importance we attach to continued progress in this field, and to urge Contracting Parties to eliminate without further delay the remaining discrimination.

A number of countries have now reached the position where controls are no longer maintained for balance of payments reasons. This includes the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Germany and Italy. While few restrictions remain in the United Kingdom, there are a number of products of interest to Canada which continue under control, including bacon. The Netherlands has undertaken to report to this Session on their plans for the removal of the remaining restrictions they maintain. Prospects are that the liberalization measures which are now under consideration by Italy leave a substantially longer list of items under control and, for some of these, the restrictions will be applied in a discriminatory manner. As far as Germany is concerned, the restrictions which it maintains have been under consideration by the contracting parties for some time.

If progress is to be made in obtaining the removal of the restrictions which continue to be applied by GATT countries as they move out of balance of payments difficulties, special procedures may be necessary. The Canadian Delegation should be authorized in consultation with other contracting parties to seek such procedures as may be necessary. In the event that procedures are worked out which would require all contracting parties to report and submit for examination the items which they maintain under restrictions, Canada would be required to submit the quantitative limitation it maintains on trade in the field of agricultural products. (Such a review has already taken place in the agricultural consultations under GATT in March this year.)

5. Agricultural Consultations

Initiatives were taken by the contracting parties in 1958 looking to a reduction in barriers to trade in agricultural products. As a first step, consultations with all contracting parties were undertaken. Canada was consulted in March 1960. These country consultations are to be completed by the end of this year.

As this Session an interim report is being submitted to the Contracting Parties on the consultations which have so far taken place. Efforts may be made by a number of other countries to make recommendations. The Canadian Delegation should resist any such proposals as being premature. The Canadian Delegation should indicate its continued support for this study of agricultural protectionism and the importance it attaches to moving as quickly as possible to the next stage looking to early action in finding ways and means of improving trading opportunities in the field of agricultural products.

6. Low-cost Imports

Procedures were initiated at the Fifteenth Session in Tokyo to examine problems for trade arising out of competition from low-cost imports (e.g. imports from Japan, India and Hong Kong). As a first step countries have submitted to the GATT Secretariat a factual report on what measures they are taking to deal with the problem. This factual analysis will be available to the contracting parties at this Session.

As far as Canada is concerned, the Canadian market has absorbed a substantially larger share of the imports from the so-called low-cost countries than most other contracting parties. Pressures on the Canadian market would be markedly eased were other countries persuaded to take a larger share.

The Canadian Delegation should again emphasize the importance we attach to a satisfactory solution to this problem under which all countries and particularly the more industrialized areas of Western Europe would accommodate the exports of the low-cost producers to a substantially greater extent. As far as further action by the contracting parties is concerned, the Canadian Delegation should support practical proposals for acceptable procedures which would have the effect of spreading more evenly the impact of low-cost competition while at the same time giving countries the possibility of dealing with disruptive import situations.

7. Tariff Conference

Consultations are expected to take place at this Session regarding the possible participation of Poland in the forthcoming tariff conference. Cabinet has approved the Declaration associating Poland with the General Agreement and has agreed to procedures whereby consultations are to be conducted by individual contracting parties to explore the possibility of Polish participation in the negotiations.

In line with the Canadian Government's policy of exploring ways and means of establishing mutually advantageous trading relations with countries of the Soviet Bloc, the Canadian Delegation should be authorized to enter into consultations with the Polish representatives at this Session and to explore the possibility of meaningful negotiations between Canada and Poland at the 1960-61 Tariff Conference. Such exploratory discussions should not rule out the possibility of negotiations based on undertakings on the Canadian side relating to the Canadian tariff in return for commitments by Poland regarding import quotas for Canadian products. The Canadian Delegation should not go beyond exploratory discussion at this stage and a final decision regarding possible negotiations with Poland under GATT should be left to a later stage.

8. GATT Organization

It is expected that proposals will be put forward at this Session for the establishment of a continuing GATT administrative body. The objective would be to strengthen the administration of the General Agreement. The question of strengthening the staff of the GATT may also be raised.

The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade continues to be the basic instrument of Canada's trade and commercial relations. The emergence of various regional trading arrangements make it all the more important that safeguards provided in the General Agreement against the growth of discriminatory trading arrangements which could adversely affect Canada's trade should be effectively applied. The Canadian Delegation should support practical proposals for improving the administrative machinery and general effectiveness of the Agreement, including the establishment of an Executive Council.[116]

GATT SESSION

1. Contracting Parties at 16th Session faced a number of important GATT issues. We have reported separately on some of these. Following is summary of developments:

2. EFTA. No repeat no agreement was reached at this session for dealing with EFTA under the agreement. Examination focused mainly on how QR's might be used by member states, arrangements for agricultural trade, and on the implications of the UK and Portuguese preferential tariff systems. The subject will be included on agenda of 17th Session, but opinion is divided on whether a decision should be taken at that time and if so, under which GATT article. USA adhered to position that EFTA should be dealt with under Article 25, and we understand may proceed to the drafting of a possible waiver.

3. LAFTA. A working party was established and held two meetings at which preliminary examination took place of first list of questions and answers (L/1201). Some useful results were obtained, particularly on way in which national and common tariff liberalization list would operate. Working party will meet again October 17-29 to conduct thorough examination on the basis of further replies of member states to questions, and to make recommendations to Contracting Parties. LAFTA countries hope for favourable decision at 17th Session.

4. EEC. Community representative presented report to Contracting Parties on recent developments. Main concerns of Contracting Parties were with agricultural policies of Six. Contracting Parties emphasized need for examination in GATT of Commission's proposals on agriculture before decisions are taken, Canada with support of Australia and USA called for the submission of Commission's proposals to Contracting Parties soon after they are presented to EEC Council of Ministers.

5. Paris Economic Meetings. India, Australia and Japan expressed grave apprehensions about effects of new OECD on strength and role of GATT, and were joined by many other outside countries. Subject will be on agenda of 17th Session. Importance of having interests of Contracting Parties represented at Paris meetings by GATT Executive Secretary was stressed.

6. Residual QRs. It was not repeat not possible at this session to establish special procedures for dealing with problem of residual QRs maintained by countries emerging from balance of payments difficulties. However, there was broad acceptance of importance for the Contracting Parties to deal effectively with these remaining restrictions. It was left that efforts should be made to make existing procedures work. USA, with fairly broad support (especially Australia, India and ourselves) indicated that if these procedures proved inadequate in the coming months alternative arrangements would have to be made. Italy announced a list of items expected to be liberalized shortly which would bring dollar and OEEC level of liberalization substantially into line. However a large number of items would remain under restriction and existing degree of discrimination against Japan would not repeat not be effected. Italy agreed to consult under procedures for joint consultations under Article 22 with countries having a substantial interest in any items remaining under restriction. A number of countries including USA and ourselves indicated an interest in joining in these consultations, and time for consultations is tentatively provided from July 4-15.

7. In the light of strong pressure at Tokyo, Belgium announced list of agricultural items to be liberalized, and introduction of system of variable import levies on these products. USA, NZ, ourselves and others expressed reservations about the introduction of variable levies to replace QRs, but there was insufficient time to examine this aspect. Belgian restrictions will in any case be on agenda of 17th Session.

8. Tariff Conference. Tariff Negotiations Committee was established in order that it could meet in advance of conference to deal with any problems relating to negotiations which may arise (e.g. questions relating to possible participation of Poland). No repeat no formal arrangements were made for examination of Contracting Parties of level of EEC common tariff under Article 24:5(a) but there will be an informal meeting of interested Contracting Parties which will provide an opportunity for interested countries to examine validity of contention of EEC Commission that general incidence of common tariff is no repeat no higher than level of individual tariffs of member countries.

9. GATT Organization. It was agreed to establish a Council of Representatives of Contracting Parties with powers broader than those of former intercessional committee. Twenty nine countries have so far indicated willingness to accept responsibilities of membership. There is some danger that membership may be too large and also that the representations of some countries may not repeat not be appropriate. Wyndham White will be consulting informally with delegates in this respect and it is envisaged that the problem, if it proves to be a real one, will be discussed again at the 17th Session. It may be, however, that in practice, attendance at council meetings will be confined largely to those countries that have arranged for effective representation.

10. Expansion of Trade Programme. Committee II conducted consultations with five countries during session and presented its second report to Contracting Parties (L/1192). It was decided that the Committee's next tasks would be to analyse on a global basis the effect of individual agricultural policies and systems on international trade in groups of important commodities (e.g. dairy products, cereals); and to study the possibility of measuring agricultural protection. The Committee will take up this work when it meets again October 3-21, at which time further (and probably the last) country consultations will also be held (L/1207).

11. Committee III presented its third report (L/1162) and its work so far drew expressions of satisfaction from the less developed countries. The Committee is scheduled to meet again September 26-October 7 to embark on the next stages of its work programme.

12. Definitive Ratification of Agreement. Wyndham White made a strong plea at the final plenary meeting for the formal and definitive acceptance of the GATT by Contracting Parties under Article 26, as a logical and important corollary to the establishment of more effective GATT machinery. Although the legal force of the agreement would not repeat not be affected by this step, it would have an important psychological and potential effect on the stature of GATT.

13. Market Disruption (Low Cost Imports). Following complex and delicate informal discussions, agreement was reached on the establishment of a working party "to consider the problems... and suggest multilaterally acceptable solutions, consistent with the principles and objectives of the general agreement, for those problems ... which appear to call for immediate action." This working party will also make arrangements for a broad study of the problem. Grandy was appointed Chairman of the Working Party and it will hold its first meeting here September 12-16.

14. New Members. Decisions were taken to invite Spain and Portugal to participate in work of Contracting Parties and to arrange for their participation in Tariff Conference, with a view to their accession under Article 33. A number of countries expressed intention, pending their accession, of basing their commercial relations with Spain and Portugal on provisions of GATT. It is expected that consultations with these countries on their commercial policies will take place at 17th Session.

15. Forthcoming Meetings. Balance of Payments Committee (and possibly Article 22 consultations with Italy)- July 4-15; Tariff Conference – September 1; Working Party on Market Disruption – September 5-16; GATT Council – September 19-23; Committee III – September 26-October 7; Committee II – October 13-21; LAFTA Working Party Oct. 17-29; Balance of Payments Committee – October 17-November 4; Seventeenth Session – October 31.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SEVENTEENTH SESSION OF GATT

The Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade meet twice yearly a regular session to administer the Agreement and to deal with various problems of international trade. The 17th Session opens in Geneva on October 31st and is expected to last three weeks.

(This meeting of the GATT countries is separate from the Tariff Conference which is currently going on in Geneva and in which a Canadian delegation under the chairmanship of Mr. H.B. McKinnon is participating. A number of major issues of international trade are being pursued primarily through the Tariff Conference: (1) Problems relating to the level of the common tariff of the European Economic Community of the Six (the Common Market); (2) the question of Canadian access to European markets for agricultural products; (3) the tariff barriers to Canada's trade in the United States and other markets and (4) the short term difficulties relating to the trade split in Europe between the Common Market Six and the Seven countries of the European Free Trade Association which includes the United Kingdom.)

A number of problems of particular interest to Canada in the field of international trade are up for consideration at this Session. The principal matters are: (a) Problems relating to the continued maintenance of quantitative restrictions which affect Canadian exports; (b) the examination of the European Free Trade Association; (c) proposals for a Latin American Free Trade Association; (d) special problems relating to trade in agricultural products; (e) market disruption arising from low-cost imports; (f) limitation on export subsidies; and (g) arrangements for the accession of new members to the General Agreement.

It is recommended that a Canadian Delegation participate in the work of the 17th Session with a view to protecting Canadian trade interests and expanding Canada's export opportunities. It is further recommended that Mr. J.H. Warren, Assistant Deputy Minister (Trade Policy), Department of Trade and Commerce, should be Chairman of the Canadian Delegation; that Mr. J.F. Grandy, Director, International Economic Relations, Department of Finance, should be Deputy Head of the Delegation, and that the following officials should be included in the Delegation:

Mr. M.A. Crowe	-	Department of External Affairs
Mr. V.L. Chapin	-	Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. B. Shapiro	-	Department of Trade and Commerce
Dr. G.J. Dobson	-	Department of Agriculture
Mr. W.F. Stone	-	Canadian Permanent Mission, Geneva

that Mr. L.C. Howey of the Department of National Revenue and currently with the Canadian Tariff Delegation in Geneva participate in the work of the Delegation as required; and that Mr. R.M. Tait of the Canadian Permanent Mission, Geneva, act as Secretary to the Delegation.

The Canadian Delegation should be guided by the following general considerations relating to the main items on the agenda of the Session.

1. Quantitative Restrictions

While substantial progress has been made in freeing Canadian exports from quantitative barriers to trade in world markets, more remains to be done. The continued maintenance of import controls disturbs the balance of advantage in the Agreement. The Canadian Delegation should stress the importance of proceeding rapidly with the removal of the remaining quantitative restrictions which are no longer justifiable on balance of payments grounds. The Canadian Delegation should seek to ensure that effective arrangements are made to accelerate the elimination of these controls and should insist on the elimination of any discrimination against Canadian exports which may remain.

2. European Free Trade Association

At the Session the Contracting Parties are expected to complete the detailed examination of the Convention for a European Free Trade Association (the United Kingdom together with Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Austria, Switzerland and Portugal) in terms of its compatibility with the GATT provisions. The EFTA envisages the possible use of quantitative restrictions in certain circumstances which could involve some discrimination. Further, there are special arrangements relating to trade in agricultural products which may be inconsistent with the Agreement. The Canadian Delegation should seek satisfactory assurances and procedures for dealing with this Convention under GATT which would safeguard against such developments affecting Canadian trade.

3. Latin American Free Trade Association

The Montevideo Treaty providing for a free trade arrangement in Latin America among Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Mexico, Peru, and Uruguay is not yet in effect. The Treaty itself is in only general terms and the detailed arrangements are yet to be worked out. Accordingly, it is not possible at this stage to draw any precise conclusions as to the possible implications for Canadian trade. The Canadian Delegation should seek to obtain effective arrangements which would permit Canada and other contracting parties to maintain a close liaison with the Latin American countries so as to provide an opportunity to safeguard Canadian trade interests as the Latin American Free Trade Association evolves.

4. Trade in Agricultural Products

The contracting parties have completed their detailed examination of the policies and restrictions of member countries affecting trade in agricultural products. The next phase of the work will be to explore ways of expanding agricultural trade. Canada has major agricultural export interests and will wish to play an active role in this programme. The Canadian Delegation should seek to ensure that the work in this field is carried forward on a constructive and realistic basis with the objective of providing expanded opportunities for Canada's agricultural exports. (While Canada has an agricultural support programme of its own, these measures and their effects on trade are relatively modest compared to those maintained by many other countries.)

5. Avoidance of Market Disruption

The contracting parties are currently engaged in a study of how to avoid market disruption resulting from rapid increases of low-cost imports and how to facilitate further progress in the removal of the restrictions maintained principally by the European countries against imports from Japan (and in some cases from Hong Kong and India). Canada now takes a disproportionately large share of imports from Japan and progress in the relaxation of restrictions by other countries would ease the burden on us. Further, generally agreed ways of dealing with the problem of low-cost competition should facilitate agreement between Canada and Japan on our own particular problems. The Canadian Delegation should therefore seek agreement on an international solution of this problem and continue to press other countries to take a fair share of the low-cost goods.

6. Export Subsidies

It has so far not been possible in the GATT to obtain international agreement on an effective means of limiting the use of export subsidies. Even in the field of non-primary products the most that has been possible has been agreement on a so-called standstill, i.e., agreement that new export subsidies on non-primary products would not be introduced.

Consideration will be given at this Session to the possibility of making some further progress on the limitation of export subsidies. It may be proposed that instead of the present standstill there should be agreement to prohibit export subsidies except on agricultural products and other primary products. The only subsidies paid by the Canadian Government apply to primary products — certain agricultural products and coal. The subsidization of exports by other countries is clearly not in Canada's interests and the Canadian Delegation should support the proposal to prohibit the introduction of new export subsidies on products other than primary products. Before doing so they should ensure that the subsidies now being paid or which may be paid under our agricultural price support programme will not be subject to the prohibition.

It is possible that there may also be some attempt to begin to introduce limitations on the subsidization of primary products. If it were feasible to obtain effective international restraints on agricultural export subsidies Canada would stand to benefit. In present circumstances, however, it is not conceivable that the United States (and some other countries) could accept any effective limitations. Should proposals be made in this field, therefore, the Canadian Delegation should not make any commitment but should support any realistic proposals to explore reasonable suggestions for later consideration.

7. Accession of New Members

Arrangements for the accession of Argentina, Ireland, Portugal and Spain are expected to be worked out at this Session. In addition, there will be discussions relating to the full accession of Switzerland to the General Agreement. The Canadian Delegation should welcome the participation of new members. At the same time, the Delegation should seek to ensure that the acceding countries are prepared to comply with the GATT obligations and in particular should not acquiesce in any arrangements which would permit the perpetuation of discriminatory restrictions by any of these countries against Canadian trade.[117]

GATT 17TH SESSION

Following is a summary of the more important developments at the session, November 1-19.

2. Market Disruption. It became clear that countries concerned could not reach agreement at this time on new safeguard measures under the agreement, involving some measure of international control, to deal with the disruptive effects of low cost imports. After extensive discussion it was finally agreed that the present Working Party should be turned into a standing committee empowered to arrange for multilateral consultations on particular disruption problems. The report adopted by Contracting Parties contains a reference to the readiness of countries which do not repeat not apply GATT to Japan to participate in the consultations. UK introduced wording in the decision aimed at limiting discussion of bilateral agreements to problems created for third countries. However the decision may be somewhat ambiguous in this regard, since Working Party's report also draws attention to the value of the consultations "to Contracting Parties failing to reach a satisfactory conclusion in bilateral consultations, or where a bilateral solution is inadequate."

3. The search for more direct safeguard measures under GATT provisions will be continued by the new committee, which will take over the terms of reference of the former Working Party, including the supervision of GATT-ILO study of the long range problem.

4. In accepting the decision, Canadian representative expressed the view, which seemed generally supported, that the new machinery should be regarded as provisional, experimental, and subject to review in about a year's time, when Contracting Parties might in the light of experience modify the new machinery, or even abandon it. He stressed that to be successful the consultations would require the wholehearted cooperation of all countries concerned, including those which apply Article XXXV against Japan.

5. USA Delegation was pleased with the progress achieved at this session, and USA seems prepared to make early use of the new committee by seeking a consultation on textiles and garments.

6. A new development took place at the Session in the related matter of the continued nvocation of many countries of Article XXXV against Japan. Japanese contended that the situation was worsening for them because newly acceding countries were also refusing to enter nto GATT relations with Japan, many for reasons not repeat not related to trade con-siderations. The present situation, Japanese contended, was not repeat not only damaging to apanese interests, but was also frustrating the aims and operation of the General Agreement by standing in the way of tariff negotiations between Japan and other major trading countries, nd by placing obstacles in the way of the liberalization of Japanese imports on a non repeat on discriminatory basis.

7. Against this background, Japanese called for a review of the situation by Contracting arties as provided for in Article XXV(2). A number of delegates, including Canadian, xpressed understanding of Japan's situation, and Contracting Parties agreed to ask the Council to make arrangements for this review. The review will provide an additional pportunity for focusing attention on the problem of low cost Japanese exports, and on the ifficulties for countries like USA and Canada resulting from the restrictive policies of other ountries toward Japanese goods.

8. Import Restrictions. A number of important countries such as UK, France, Italy, Sweden nd Australia, have during the past year ceased to claim balance of payments justification for eir restrictions. However, in varying degree they continue to maintain residual import strictions.

9. USA, which has postponed its earlier proposals for new procedures in GATT to deal with ese residual restrictions, again stressed its expectation that Contracting Parties would operate in making the existing provisions work more effectively, and restated its intention to view the need for new procedures in the light of experience in the future. Contracting Parties dorsed the Council's recommendations that countries should be invited to submit lists of strictions being maintained in contravention of the Agreement and not repeat not covered by aivers. In accepting this, Canadian delegate stressed that these new notification procedures ould be regarded as experimental and subject to review in the light of results achieved. nding further experience in dealing with residual import restrictions the hard core decision as extended until end of 1961.

0. USA demonstrated its intention to make effective use of existing procedures by questing an early consultation with France on its substantial list of remaining restrictions ainst USA imports, in which Canada and other countries will doubtless wish to join. (We are porting separately on this development). USA also obtained agreement from Contracting rties for the setting up of a Working Party, to be called at USA request to consult with Italy der Article XXII(2) or Article XXIII(2). USA stated it would decide whether or not repeat to call this Working Party in the light of progress by Italy in the near future in further moving restrictions, and has in mind a possible meeting in February. (We are also reporting parately on this matter). Germany's report on its restrictions provided a further occasion for ny countries, including Canada, to call for faster progress toward complete liberalization l meanwhile for greater and fairer access to German market, particularly for basic icultural products.

11. Subsidies. Contracting Parties took action to strengthen the provisions of the Agreement relating to export subsidies, by opening a declaration under which signatory countries would undertake to prohibit the use of subsidies on non repeat non primary products and bring into effect (for signatories) the provisions of Article XVI(4). The declaration will come into effect on its acceptance by fourteen so-called key countries, including Canada. For countries unable to sign at once this declaration calling for outright prohibition, an accompanying instrument is to be opened, under which signatories will undertake not repeat not to increase subsidies on non repeat non primary products beyond those being used at present. It is the expectation that countries signing this second declaration will in time be able to accept the obligations of the first. Contracting Parties took note of an illustrative list of prohibited practices which would generally be considered as subsidies under Article XVI(4) unless regarded as acceptable multiple currency practices under IMF rules. There was extensive discussion of whether any additional clarification of the term primary commodities was desirable, and a number of other countries expressed concerns similar to our own about possible difficulties which could arise. In the end, however, it was considered that the present interpretation provided adequate guidance to deal with specific cases of problems of definition. Some latitude is thus given to the exporting country concerned in deciding whether or not repeat not a particular product is covered by the declaration, although their decisions could of course be challenged by other Contracting Parties.

12. It was recognized that the new arrangements are not repeat not altogether satisfactory. Only the industrialized countries of Europe and North America were prepared at this time to undertake to prohibit the use of export subsidies on non-primary products, and Japan's absence from the list of key countries gave rise to particular concern. Japan evidently continues to operate subsidies on a number of non repeat non primary products, including ships for export and is not repeat not prepared at this stage to abandon these subsidies although willing to undertake not repeat not to increase them and to sign the second standstill instrument referred to above. Less developed countries such as India seem unwilling to undertake any commitments whatever on subsidies. And, as pointed out forcefully by New Zealand and Australia, the new arrangements add further to the difference of treatment under the agreement of industrial and agricultural products. Nevertheless, the new arrangements can fairly be regarded as important progress, since until now the only commitment under Article XVI(4) was to apply a standstill on subsidies existing on January 1/55. It will also bring under GATT, commitments which European and North American countries would otherwise be seeking to implement under the less universal aegis of OECD.

13. Regional Groups. The members of Montevideo Treaty stated that they were obliged to obtain a sufficient measure of endorsement for their treaty from Contracting Parties to enable them to secure ratifications by their respective parliaments and to put into effect the provisions of the treaty. However, the examination in the Working Party revealed that at this stage it would be impossible to conclude that the arrangements (especially as regards agriculture) as they developed would be compatible with Article XXIV. In the end the member countries were content to accept a set of conclusions essentially along the lines reached in the case of Rome Treaty. Contracting Parties concluded that there were legal and practical questions which it would be difficult to settle solely on the basis of the Treaty, and that these could more fruitfully be discussed as the treaty was progressively implemented. While thus reserving judgment on the consistency of LAFTA with GATT, Contracting Parties agreed that the member countries were not repeat not thereby prevented from proceeding with the application of the Treaty, or from invoking the benefits of Article XXIV to justify actions which might otherwise be inconsistent with the Agreement. At the same time, Contracting Parties preserved their own rights under Article XXIV, and noted the facilities under Article XXII for consultation with the member countries on any measures taken by the members under their treaty. LAFTA countries expressed their readiness to furnish info to Contracting Parties under XXIV:7(a) as their treaty developed and also to provide info in the context of Article XXII consultations.

14. In the light of the need to accommodate LAFTA at this session it was considered that Contracting Parties could not repeat no longer remain silent on EFTA. The conclusions agreed on EFTA are almost identical with those adopted for LAFTA, the only differences being those arising from the fact that the Stockholm Convention has already been ratified and put into effect.

15. These conclusions on LAFTA and EFTA are closely in line with those reached at the 13th Session regarding EEC. The willingness of members of three groups to furnish information to Contracting Parties and to consult will provide opportunities for continuing scrutiny of the three arrangements as they are developed. In this regard, EEC representatives at this Session were urged to accept somewhat more positive undertakings regarding the regular submission of information to Contracting Parties, and the distribution to Contracting Parties of their official documents and publications.

16. The debate on EEC focused on the common agricultural policy. We and other outside agricultural exporters joined USA in calling for a much more satisfactory settlement on agriculture than had as yet been offered by the Six in the context of the current Article XIV(6) tariff negotiations. The agricultural exporters also joined USA in urging the Six to present to Contracting Parties for discussion the Commission's proposals relating to the cap, but the Six rejected this proposal on the grounds that the Commission's proposal had not yet been considered by the member countries. Less developed countries repeated their concern about the arrangements for overseas territories. A number of these countries also made an appeal for negotiations to open at once under Article XXIV(5A) which requires that on the whole the incidence of the common tariff should not repeat not be higher or more restrictive than the general incidence of existing tariffs of member countries. It was decided by Contracting Parties however that the examination of the common tariff under Article XXIV(5A) should be left to the Tariff Negotiations Committee, which should decide on the timing in the light of progress in the Article XXIV(6) negotiations. In the view of our tariff delegation, Contracting Parties should not repeat not be diverted at this stage from the main task of Article XXIV(6) negotiations, and more should be known of the likely results of these negotiations before the Article XXIV(5A) examination is proceeded with.

17. OECD. Apprehensions were expressed in terms similar to those expressed at 16th Session concerning the assumption of trade functions by OECD. In reply, UK and other prospective OECD members were able to point to provisions agreed by the Preparatory Committee in Paris (mainly at the instance of Canada and USA) relating to the maintenance of the existing international obligations of member countries, non repeat non discriminatory trade policies, participation of GATT officers, etc. We joined with USA in stressing our continuing support for GATT which should retain primacy in the field of international trade obligations.

18. New Members. Nigeria acceded as a new member under Article XXVI:5(C). The provisional accession of Argentina was approved. Arrangements were agreed for the participation of Ireland in the Tariff Conference with a view to accession under Article XXXIII. (We are reporting separately on the subject of new members).

19. Miscellaneous. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article XXVIII(1), the time limit for the conclusion of the current series of Article XXVIII negotiations concerning the modification or withdrawal of particular concessions was extended from January 1/60 to March 31; the deadline may be further extended with the consent of the Council. With some minor economies, Contracting Parties adopted the Executive Secretary's budget proposals which will permit a considerable (and overdue) strengthening of the Secretariat in 1961. The next meeting of GATT Council has been scheduled for February 22-March 3 and the 18th Session will be held May 1-19. The present slate of GATT officers will continue in office until the end of the 19th Session next fall.

CONFIDENTIAL

GATT 1960-61 TARIFF CONFERENCE

The fifth round of multilateral tariff negotiations to be held under the auspices of th General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) will open in Geneva on September 1, 196 This Conference has been planned as a major part of a GATT programme for the expansion international trade and will include a general round of negotiations for new concession negotiations with countries acceding to the GATT (Cambodia, Israel, Yugoslavia, Portuga Spain, and Tunisia), and re-negotiations with countries wishing to modify existin concessions. A number of countries have also indicated that they may be negotiating wit Poland on the basis of exchanging tariff concessions against commitments to purchase. Th first four months of the Conference will be devoted to important re-negotiations with th European Common Market countries related to the establishment of their common extern tariff. It is expected that the entire Conference will last about a year.

The intention of Canada to participate in this Conference was announced last Octobe Since that time Ministers have been receiving representations from various groups concernir possible alterations in the Canadian tariff and concessions which should be sought in the tarif of other countries. On the basis of these representations and in the light of all the releva considerations, the departments concerned are at present engaged in drawing up f consideration lists of concessions which the Delegation should seek of other countries and adjustments in the Canadian tariff which might be appropriate.

Ministers will be aware that these tariff negotiations will be of great importance for t future of Canadian trade since the future structure of Canadian commercial relations wi Europe will be affected by their outcome. It is essential, therefore, to ensure that Canada represented by a strong delegation which will be able to protect Canadian interests and win t maximum in new concessions. The appointment of Mr. H.B. McKinnon as Chairman of t Delegation has already been approved by Ministers. It is at present envisaged that some seni officials, who would be able to give policy guidance, would from time to time be designat by their respective Ministers to attend the Conference for such periods as might be necessa These officials would include the following:

Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Asst. Deputy Minister of Finance, Deputy Chairman
Mr. S.S. Reisman, Dept. of Finance, Deputy Chairman

Mr. J.H. Warren, Asst. Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Deputy Chairman.
Mr. O.C. Stoner, Dept. of External Affairs
Mr. C.A. Annis, Dept. of Finance
Mr. R.E. Latimer, Dept. of Trade and Commerce.

In addition, it is expected that some six officers and four administrative and stenographic staff from the Departments of Trade and Commerce, Finance, Agriculture and National Revenue would attend the conference on a continuing basis. The Secretary of the Delegation will be drawn from the Department of External Affairs. The Delegation would be assisted by the First Secretary at the Canadian Permanent Mission, who is responsible for GATT matters in Geneva.

Although it is possible that representatives of Canadian industries will be present in Geneva, it is recommended that they should not have any official status on the Delegation.

I wish to recommend, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce:

(i) that the foregoing arrangements for staffing the Delegations be approved;

(ii) that, under the direction of the Chairman, the Delegation and other officials concerned proceed with the preparatory work for the Tariff Conference;

(iii) that at a later date appropriate instructions should be sought.[118]

GATT TARIFF CONFERENCE 1960-61 — INSTRUCTIONS

1. Previous memoranda have dealt with the composition of the Delegation and preparations for the Conference. This Memorandum deals with the substantive aspects of the Conference and proposes instructions to the Delegation. The instructions are cast in general terms. In view of the major importance of the Conference it will be necessary for the Delegation to consult interested Ministers as the negotiations proceed.

2. There will be five kinds of negotiations:

(A) Renegotiations with the six members of the European Economic Community;

(B) Renegotiations with any other countries wishing to withdraw any present bindings;

(C) Renegotiations of some items in the Canadian Schedule in the light of Tariff Board reports;

(D) Negotiations for new concessions with a number of countries including the European Economic Community (as a unit) and the United States;

(E) Negotiations with countries applying for accession to the General Agreement, e.g., Spain and Portugal.

[118] Approuvé par le Cabinet le 11 août 1960./Approved by Cabinet on August 11, 1960.

A. RENEGOTIATIONS WITH THE EEC

3. The proposed common tariff of the European Common Market countries is to come under examination and negotiation. It is of major importance to Canada to ensure that to the fullest extent possible our exports to the EEC market enjoy as favourable terms of access as obtained under the previous régime of national tariffs. Through earlier GATT Tariff Conferences the Six countries individually bound rates of duty in their national tariffs against increase in return for reciprocal concessions on the part of Canada and other Contracting Parties. To implement the common tariff the EEC countries must renegotiate such tariff bindings and should establish a new schedule of concessions which would maintain the balance of advantage under the previous tariff agreements. Most items in Canada's trade with Europe had been bound in the tariffs of one or other of the Six countries under these agreements. The proposed common market tariff involves decreases below existing bindings as well as increases above existing bindings. Thus for the increases there will be some compensation to other countries with the proposed common tariff structure. For a number of products of interest to Canada, however, the increases from present German and Benelux rates will have a greater effect on trade than the decreases that would be made in the French and Italian tariffs.

4. Apart from the actual rates of the Common Market tariff, present proposals regarding the common agricultural policy to be pursued by the Community pose a major threat to Canadian export interests. The prospect is that the tariff will be only one of a variety of protective instruments to control agricultural imports into the Community and variable import levies, quantitative restrictions, state trading and other devices seem likely to be used. The main products of interest to Canada which could be adversely affected by these arrangements are wheat, coarse grains, tobacco, vegetable oils, apples and fish: these agricultural items account for 40 per cent of our trade with the Six. It will be important for Canada and other agricultural suppliers to reach meaningful understanding with the Six concerning this sector of trade.

5. The Canadian Delegation should make every effort to seek lower common tariff rates for products of interest to Canada where the rates proposed are unsatisfactory from our point of view. The tariff concessions which have already been negotiated with the individual Common Market countries in previous conferences and which the Six must renegotiate should generally provide a firm basis for obtaining reasonable tariff access to the EEC market. If the Common Tariff as it evolves from the renegotiations should prove, on balance, to be less advantageous to Canada than the present national rates in respect of bound items, consideration should be given to the desirability of appropriate compensatory withdrawals from the schedule of Canadian tariff concessions. To the extent that the present terms of tariff access to the markets of the EEC are maintained and bound against increase in the negotiations, it would be appropriate to rebind to the EEC Canadian concessions which are now bound to individual members of the EEC, subject to what is said below about agriculture.

6. Since tariffs are expected to be only one of various protective devices used by the EEC in the field of agriculture, the Canadian Delegation should not accept tariff concessions alone as an adequate safeguard for Canadian exports of agricultural products. The Canadian Delegation should seek to obtain commitments from the Six which would give assurance about the totality of barriers that affect this trade and provide opportunity for our exports to compete effectively in the Common market. As a minimum Canada should seek arrangements which would assure us a fair share of the existing European market for agricultural products and of any increase in that market.

B. RENEGOTIATIONS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

7. It is the responsibility of any country wishing to withdraw concessions to offer equivalent compensation, or to expect the withdrawal of equivalent concessions which it enjoys. Some countries other than the Six may wish to negotiate the withdrawal or modification of some concessions bound to Canada. However, preliminary indications are that negotiations of this kind will not be numerous or important, and that it is not likely that they will raise any question of compensatory withdrawals by Canada. The special case of lead and zinc is referred to in paragraph D.

C. RENEGOTIATION OF CERTAIN ITEMS IN THE CANADIAN SCHEDULE

8. Under the terms of GATT Article XXVIII bound items not modified or withdrawn before the end of 1960 are automatically renewed for a further three-year period. Such an extension of the bindings, however, is subject to the "special circumstances" provision whereby a country may obtain authority from the Contracting Parties to renegotiate particular items within the three-year period of "firm" bindings.

9. In 1957 the Tariff Board was instructed to undertake a comprehensive review of the whole of the Canadian textile schedule.[119] Reports on certain important parts of that schedule were received in 1959 and implemented in the 1960 Budget, following renegotiations. Further reports on textiles are expected shortly, and, if approved by the Government, any necessary consequential negotiations should be undertaken by the Delegation. The Delegation should also secure the withdrawal or modification of the present commitment on automatic record changers to permit implementation of the Tariff Board Report thereon, and should undertake the negotiation of any minor changes in other items in the present Canadian schedule which it may appear desirable to modify in the light of a review which the Minister of Finance is making of representations which have been submitted.

10. With respect to chemicals and other references now before the Board (apart from textiles which are dealt with above) no action is required at the forthcoming Conference. The Delegation may, as appropriate, indicate to the Contracting Parties before the end of 1960 that after the Tariff Board completes its investigations in respect of references now before it, Canada may wish to avail itself of the "special circumstances" provisions of Article XXVIII for the renegotiation of certain items. With respect to the automobile schedule the Delegation may be given further instructions before the end of the year in the light of progress made by the recently appointed Royal Commission.

D. NEGOTIATIONS FOR NEW CONCESSIONS

11. The negotiations for new concessions normally take place between pairs of countries and involve the exchange of new concessions on both sides of approximately equivalent value. As part of a general programme for the expansion of international trade, the United States has undertaken to make further reductions in the U.S. tariff on the basis of reciprocity. It is expected that there will be a substantial new negotiation between the United States and the EEC. In addition, the United Kingdom and other countries of the European Free Trade Association have indicated their intention to negotiate with the EEC as well as with the United States and this former aspect of the negotiations is of significance for the trade split in Europe. Unless some generally acceptable means is found to mitigate the trade difficulties between the Six and the Seven there is danger that preferential arrangements will be worked out between the two groups, which would discriminate against Canada and other outside countries and undermine the multilateral trading system. Multilateral negotiations between the Six and the Seven at the forthcoming Tariff Conference, as a means of reducing European tariff barriers would make an important contribution toward easing these difficulties. Canada will benefit, of course, from the negotiations between the European Economic Community and the United States since the tariff concessions will be extended to all countries in the GATT on the basis of the most-favoured-nation principle. Canada should also benefit from some of the other negotiations; e.g. between other European countries on the one hand, and the United States and the EEC on the other.

12. Negotiations between the United Kingdom and the EEC and between the United Kingdom and the United States will affect us in two ways. To the extent that they result in lower EEC and the United States tariffs on products of interest to Canada, we will benefit. But to the extent that they result in lower United Kingdom M.F.N. tariffs our margins of preference in the United Kingdom will be reduced since we enjoy free entry, but not bound margins of preference, for most products in the United Kingdom. In respect of some Canadian exports the benefits of existing margins of preference in the United Kingdom market will be reduced also by the formation of the European Free Trade Association, which ultimately will involve complete free trade in industrial products among the United Kingdom and the other members of the Outer Seven.

13. Although under a 1947 exchange of notes Canada and the United Kingdom mutually released each other from their previous contractual commitments to each other in respect of margins of preference,[120] it is customary to keep in close consultation when it is proposed to alter margins which are of importance to the other country. While recognizing the broader advantages for Canada of effective U.K. participation in the Conference, the Canadian Delegation should make use of such consultations in seeking to minimize losses of preference on products of particular interest to Canada. If, however, in the negotiations the United Kingdom should reduce their M.F.N. rates of duty with consequential reductions in such margins of preference, they could not object to Canada doing likewise in the course of our negotiations. Moreover, United Kingdom participation in EFTA involves the creation of reverse preferences against us and in favour of their EFTA partners on a number of products. Accordingly, they presumably will have to seek a modification of their commitments under paragraph 8 of the Canada-U.S. Exchange of Notes of October 30, 1947. Further, if pursuant to arrangements with their European partners the United Kingdom should raise rates against us this again would justify compensatory adjustments in the Canadian tariff. These developments may create somewhat more scope for Canadian negotiations with the United States and other non-Commonwealth countries than otherwise would exist.

14. It must be recognized that after the repeated rounds of negotiations which have taken place, the scope for additional reductions in Canadian M.F.N. rates of duty is very limited. On the other hand, in our negotiations with the United States we are entitled as appropriate to seek compensation for the impairment of tariff concessions we obtained in the past on such products as lead and zinc where the United States has applied quota restrictions under the GATT escape clause. We thus may have some scope for obtaining new concessions from the United States without significantly altering the protection afforded by the Canadian Tariff to our industries. It will, however, be necessary to be prepared to offer some modest concessions in the Canadian Tariff where practicable if the benefits to be obtained in other markets clearly justify this. Such reductions should be carefully chosen to benefit Canadian consumers, while minimizing the impact on Canadian producers. The Canadian Delegation should seek new tariff concessions of benefit to Canadian exports to the United States, European and other countries, making use where possible of such bargaining power as is available without adversely affecting the effective level of protection afforded to Canadian agriculture and industry. If worthwhile benefits could be obtained in exchange for tariff concessions by Canada, the Delegation should consult the Minister of Finance about the possibility of offering such concessions.

[120] Voir/See Volume 13, documents 691, 692.

E. NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEW MEMBERS

15. A number of countries, notably Spain, Portugal and Israel, will be participating for the first time in GATT tariff negotiations. Since our trade with these countries is small, the scope for negotiations on both sides is strictly limited. However, newly acceding countries are expected in return for the benefits of tariff concessions previously negotiated, to pay a form of "admission fee" through tariff concessions on their side. Accordingly, it is recommended that the Canadian Delegation be authorized to enter into negotiations with these three countries.

16. Finally, arrangements have been made for the association of Poland with the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement, and there may be scope for strengthening our relations with this state trading country through negotiation which would involve minimum purchase commitments on the Polish side. While Canada would not wish to play a leading role in initiating negotiations of this kind, the Canadian Delegation should, in consultation with the Polish Delegation and other countries, explore the possibilities that may exist.

Recommendation

17. It is recommended that the Delegation to the 1960-61 GATT Tariff Conference should be guided by the foregoing instructions on the understanding that the Delegation would consult as required with the Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce as the negotiations proceed.

GATT TARIFF CONFERENCE — EEC PARTICIPATION

It is clear from our talks with Donne, Head of the Commissions Delegation to the Tariff Conference, that (a) the EEC does not repeat not anticipate granting any reduction in its common external tariff during the first phase of the conference; (b) the Community is convinced its tariff is already lower than required under Article XXIV(5) of the GATT; and (c) the Six will not repeat not enter the second phase of the Conference until their tariff is approved under Article XXIV.

2. The attitude of the Community for the renegotiations under Article XXIV(6) may be summarised as follows:

The common external tariff already provides built-in compensations. The binding of duties in the common external tariff constitutes further compensation since such bindings cover all countries of the Community while concessions withdrawn applied to one or two member countries only. Bindings of low duties or of duty-free treatment are concessions equivalent to reductions of high duties (Article XXIX (2) (a)). On the basis of the foregoing arguments the Six will seek to renegotiate the withdrawal or modification of concessions without offering any reduction in their common external tariff.

3. We understand that the Community's "negative list," i.e. those items which it is not repeat not prepared to bind against increase, include cereals, sugar, petroleum, lead and zinc.

4. On procedures Donne said they will table their proposals on the first day of the conference. Contracting Parties might be given something like two weeks to examine these. It will then be for the Contracting Parties to decide whether all items should be negotiated on a country-by-country and product-by-product basis, or whether it might be possible to agree on a number of items leaving only a restricted group of products for negotiations with individual Contracting Parties or group of Contracting Parties concerned. Unless something of this kind was agreed it would not repeat not be possible to complete Article XXIV negotiations by the end of the year.

5. The Six expect to have their tariff approved under Article XXIV(5) at the end of the first phase of the conference. This approval is regarded as a condition precedent for moving on to the second phase. According to calculations by EEC experts the average weighted rate of duty of the Common External Tariff on the basis of 1958 imports is something like 10 percent below that of the four constituent tariffs (7.9 percent compared with 8.6 percent). This, Donne said, provides sufficient proof that the Common External Tariff meets the requirements of Article XXIV(5). Accordingly they expect approval to be obtained readily once Article XXIV(6) negotiations are over.

6. However confident the EEC delegation may appear to be they are not repeat not so sure of themselves in regard to agriculture. Donne admitted that their offers might not repeat not be acceptable to agricultural exporters and that some means should be found to protect the interest of countries like Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

G.A.T.T. TARIFF CONFERENCE, 1960-61; INSTRUCTIONS

30. The Minister of Finance said the G.A.T.T. Tariff Conference would open in Geneva on September 1st, and that consideration should be given to the instructions to be given to the Canadian Delegation headed by Mr. Hector McKinnon. Forty countries, representing over 90 per cent of the world's international trade, were participants in these G.A.T.T. negotiations which were based on the principle of reciprocity of tariff concessions. There would be five kinds of negotiations:

(i) Renegotiations with the six members of the European Economic Community. The six countries would hereafter negotiate as one and would establish a new schedule of concessions which would maintain the overall balance of advantages under the previous tariff agreements. Germany and Holland had previously been low-tariff countries and would therefore raise the level of their rates; while France, which had formerly been a relatively high-tariff country, would lower its rates. Canada would be particularly affected by the proposed increases.

(ii) Renegotiations with any other countries wishing to withdraw any present bindings.

(iii) Renegotiation of some items in the Canadian Schedule in the light of Tariff Board reports.

(iv) Negotiations for new concessions with a number of countries, including the European Economic Community as a unit and the United States.

(v) Negotiations with countries applying for accession to the General Agreement, e.g. Spain, Portugal and Israel.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce, Aug. 16 – Cab. Doc. 266-60).

31. Mr. Fleming went on to say that the written instructions were intended to provide general guidance but that the delegation would also consult as required with the Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce as the negotiations proceeded.

In the renegotiations with the E.E.C., the Canadian Delegation should not regard tariff concessions alone as adequate safeguards for Canadian exports. The tariff would probably be only one of a variety of protective instruments to control agricultural imports into the Community, other possible instruments included variable import levies, quantitative restrictions and state trading. Canadian exports of wheat, coarse grains, tobacco, vegetable oils, apples and fish could be adversely affected by these arrangements. The Canadian Delegation should therefore seek to obtain commitments from the Six giving assurance about the totality of barriers. As a minimum Canada should seek arrangements that would give assurance of a fair share of the existing European market for agricultural products and of any increase in that market.

The Minister said that the Canadian Delegation would not ask to renegotiate many of Canada's present bindings because this would lead to demands from other countries for equivalent concessions, and these demands would almost certainly be directed against Canada's agricultural exports.

Under Article XXVIII of G.A.T.T., bound items not modified or withdrawn before the end of 1960 were automatically renewed for a further three-year period. The Tariff Board had reported in 1959 on certain parts of the Canadian textile schedule and these were then renegotiated. Further reports on textiles were expected shortly and if approved by the Government, any necessary negotiations would be undertaken by the Delegation. Further instructions might be issued on the automobile schedule before the end of the year in the light of progress made by the recently appointed Royal Commission.

32. Mr. Fleming said that the U.S. had undertaken to reduce its tariff on the basis of reciprocity. Canada would benefit from the expected negotiations between the E.E.C. and the U.S. because the tariff concessions would be extended to all countries in the G.A.T.T. on the basis of the most-favoured-nation principle. Canada should also benefit from some of the other negotiations particularly those between other European countries on the one hand and the U.S. and the E.E.C. on the other.

Negotiations between the United Kingdom and other countries would affect Canada in two ways. Any reductions in E.E.C. or U.S. tariffs on products of interest to Canada would be beneficial to us. On the other hand any reductions in United Kingdom M.F.N. tariffs would reduce Canadian margins of preference in the U.K., because we enjoy free entry but not bound margins of preference for most of our products in the U.K. He hoped to learn more about the intentions of the U.K. in three weeks' time when Mr. Churchill and himself were in London for the meeting of the Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council.

About a month previously a delegation from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association had waited upon Mr. Fleming and Mr. Churchill to urge the government not to reduce the protection to secondary industries. They had expressed satisfaction on the handling of G.A.T.T. negotiations by the government during the past three years, and their concern about the future had been allayed by the Ministers' assurance that no concessions would be made light-heartedly and that full consultation with industry would be maintained. The C.M.A. were also informed that their tariff expert would be helpful to the Canadian Delegation if he decided to proceed to Geneva.

33. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) The principle of equivalent concessions was not as fair as it appeared to be, because the original agreement had bound Canada at a low tariff level whereas other countries had been at high rates and had retained this advantage. The only equitable arrangement would be one in which negotiations would provide for the gradual raising of duties in low-tariff countries and the gradual reduction of rates in high-tariff countries.

(b) Some said that the officials tended to regard the G.A.T.T. as a sacred cow and were reluctant to contemplate any change. Canada needed to be represented by tough negotiators who would obtain the greatest possible concessions from other countries.

(c) Other members said that any general concessions given by Canada had been in force for some years. If an attempt was made at this time to withdraw them, it was only realistic to expect other nations to withdraw concessions from Canada, and in the most sensitive areas.

(d) Some said that Canada's tariff policy had the effect of sacrificing secondary industry for the sake of primary industry, and that the emphasis ought to be reversed because secondary industry produced more wealth per capita and more employment.

34. The Cabinet noted the statement of the Minister of Finance on instructions to be given to the Canadian Delegation to the G.A.T.T. Tariff Conference, 1960-61, and agreed to discuss the subject again at the next meeting of the Cabinet.

G.A.T.T. TARIFF CONFERENCE, 1960-61; INSTRUCTIONS
(Previous reference August 31)

1. The Minister of Finance outlined the contents of two memoranda prepared in his Department,† one summarizing tariff reductions in G.A.T.T. which had affected trade between the United States and Canada, and the other describing the use made of five kinds of escape clauses in the G.A.T.T. by various countries.

Article XII of the G.A.T.T. permitted a Contracting Party to apply quantitative import restrictions to safeguard its external financial position and its balance of payments, and Article XIV authorized discriminatory restrictions in certain circumstances. These provisions had been used extensively, and the Canadian and U.S. delegations had always vigorously opposed their use unless the necessity was clearly demonstrated. Relatively few restrictions of this kind now remained. The present dollar discrimination had no justification under any G.A.T.T. article. Canada could not impose restrictions under these articles because the definition of balance of payments covered capital imports in addition to commodity trade.

The Minister said a second escape clause was Article XVIII which made concessions to countries with a low standard of living. This had been used chiefly by Ceylon.

Under Article XIX concessions might be withdrawn or modified to prevent serious injury to domestic producers. This article had been used mainly by the U.S. Most important to Canada were the restrictions placed on imports of lead and zinc into the U.S. under this article. The Prime Minister had spoken to Mr. Dulles and later to President Eisenhower about the adverse effect of these restrictions upon Canada, and the subject had also been raised at the Joint Ministerial Cabinet Committee meeting in Washington in November 1957.[121] The U.S. had admitted Canada's entitlement to compensation if these restrictions became permanent, but the

[121] Voir/See Volume 25, document 137.

U.S. administration had been hoping that Congress would not fix lead and zinc quotas by statute. If Canada insisted upon compensation at this time, the likelihood of permanent restrictions by the U.S. would be increased.

The Minister said a fourth form of escape clause was Article XXIV which permitted countries to derogate from the M.F.N. rule if they participated in a free trade area or customs union. This article had been invoked by Benelux, E.E.C., E.F.T.A., the Central American Free Trade Area and the Latin America Free Trade Area.

The fifth form of escape clause was the provision in Article XXV that the Contracting Parties by a two-thirds majority might waive an obligation imposed by G.A.T.T. Three important waivers had been granted, one each to the U.S., Belgium and Germany. Throughout the life of the G.A.T.T. the U.S. had maintained restrictions on imports of certain agricultural products, although this had been in contravention of the General Agreement. In 1955 the U.S. had succeeded in obtaining a waiver to regularize their restrictions. They had not added to the restrictions, but still applied them to a number of products. In the U.S. the General Agreement had never been submitted to the Congress because of the Administration's fear that Congress would refuse to adopt it. The waiver had been insisted upon in 1955 because the Administration had expected that otherwise the Congress would have upset the Agreement at that time.

2. Mr. Fleming said that issue of the proposed general instructions to the Canadian Delegation at this time would not preclude the issue of special instructions later.

3. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said that protests against breaches of the General Agreement by other countries had failed in the past to bring about redress. Canada needed more aggressive representation at the G.A.T.T. conferences.

(b) Some members said the waiver obtained by the U.S. on agricultural products had been damaging to Canadian agriculture and that Canada should seek a similar waiver. The U.S. would never surrender its waiver and meanwhile the problems of surplus disposal in Canada would continue to increase. Next year the cost to the government of maintaining a reasonable level of agricultural prosperity would be at least $200 to $300 million and might be twice as much, depending on future U.S. agricultural policy.

(c) Others said that Canada's difficulties in this regard stemmed not from the G.A.T.T. but from the U.S. surplus disposal policy. If Canada tried to obtain a waiver, other nations would be likely to try to withdraw present concessions. Furthermore, Canadian protests had led the U.S. to modify its agricultural surplus disposal programme, but if Canada sought a waiver it could no longer protest the behaviour of the U.S. Germany had also exceeded the terms of its waiver and had given ground when pilloried.

(d) Canadians import more per capita than any other nation. The most recent statistics showed Canadian imports per capita per annum as $273, as compared with $28 for the U.S. and $48 for the U.K. On the other hand Canada was also the world's largest exporter on a per capita basis, and was the fourth trading nation in the world. Much of our imports took the form of capital goods to be used for national development. During the first 6 months of 1960 total exports had been 8 per cent higher than in 1959, a record year.

(e) Some said that U.S. firms commonly violated their contracts to buy Canadian pulp and paper and other materials if their needs were reduced or if they saw opportunities to buy more cheaply elsewhere. Others said that the reductions were rarely in breach of contract, and that legal recourse existed for any such breaches.

(f) Different opinions were expressed on the general value of G.A.T.T. to Canada. Some said the Agreement was damaging to Canada's interests. Others said that G.A.T.T. had been highly beneficial to the growth of Canada's trade. The volume of trade with the U.S. had expanded greatly, and in recent months following the removal of restrictions, encouraging progress had been made in increasing trade with the Commonwealth. A restrictive tariff would hamper Canada's economic growth. As a great trading nation, Canada's international position was particularly exposed, and non-discriminatory multilateral trade was vitally important to this country.

(g) Some said the position of secondary industry in Canada was weakening. The automobile manufacturers in Oshawa and Oakville were each reducing their labour force by 1,000 this season as compared with last year. The Steel Company of Canada had laid off 1,300 and would probably cut its employment still farther. Canadian General Electric was reducing its payroll by 3,000 persons. Other members said that on the whole the position of secondary industry was reasonably satisfactory. The index of industrial production in June 1960 was 174.1 as compared with 172.9 in June 1959. In any case the problem of foreign competition could not be met by tariffs, because they could not be raised to a level high enough to be effective.

(h) Tariff adjustments on individual products could be negotiated either at the G.A.T.T. Conference or between meetings. Prior investigation by the Tariff Board was not necessary but was a convenient procedure because the industry concerned was required to prove the need for tariff adjustment, and the views of all interested parties were heard in advance. On the other hand the Board had already been given enough work to keep it fully engaged for the next two years.

(i) Studies by officials of the further processing of Canadian raw materials had produced disappointing results. The government might consider a systematic approach to the provinces urging them, when considering the issue or renewal of resource exploitation permits, to ask the applicant companies to state their plans for the processing of the materials. The formal initiative would probably have to be taken by the provinces because of their jurisdiction over the resources, but the government of Canada was also concerned because of the implications for international trade. Applicants for permits in the Northwest Territories were normally asked to state their plans for processing.

(j) The government should urge the hydro organizations to participate in a major and co-operative research programme in the field of long-range power transmission.

(k) The Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association should be urged to launch vigorous "Buy Canadian" campaigns. The electrical goods industry was already active in this field. Different opinions were expressed on whether the Prime Minister was in a position to urge the people of Canada to buy domestic rather than imported manufactured goods.

4. The Cabinet,

(a) approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Ministers of Finance and of Trade and Commerce that the Canadian Delegation to the 1960-61 G.A.T.T. Tariff Conference should be guided by the instructions contained in the joint Memorandum of August 16th (Cab. Doc. 266-60) on the understanding

(i) that special instructions would subsequently be issued to the Delegation with regard to specific manufactured articles and agricultural products;

(ii) that the Delegation would consult as required with the Ministers of Finance and of Trade and Commerce as the negotiations proceed; and,

(b) agreed that a special committee comprising the Ministers of Finance, Agriculture and Trade and Commerce would draft special instructions to be issued to the Canadian Delegation in respect of individual commodities, for consideration by the Cabinet.

INSTRUCTIONS TO GATT TARIFF DELEGATION

Cabinet has now approved the instructions proposed by the Ministers concerned subject however to further consideration later of decision to rebind certain agricultural items and possibly some others.[122]

2. For your background information there was apparently considerable discussion of escape clauses in general and the United States agricultural waiver in particular. The feeling was strongly expressed that with this waiver the United States had retained a great deal of freedom of manoeuvre, freedom which would be denied to us unless we refrained from rebinding some items or sought a similar waiver. It was decided not repeat not to seek such a waiver.

3. Department of Agriculture will be putting before other departments a list of the particular items they would propose to consider for unbinding. This list will certainly include soya beans.[123]

My dear Jim [Roberts]:

We were glad to learn from External ET-1150 that Cabinet had in general approved instructions to the Delegation as proposed by the Ministers chiefly concerned. However, the news that this is subject to further consideration of the decision "to rebind certain agricultural items and possibly some others" would seem to have rather serious implications for our negotiating position in this Conference and more importantly for the direction of our commercial policy. I know that you and the Minister will have both these broad considerations very much in mind in your discussions, but have nevertheless thought it worthwhile to let you know how I see the picture from here.

As far as the 1961 negotiations are concerned, we must accept that there is little room to secure new concessions through reductions in our M.F.N. tariff. To the extent our limited bargaining power is used up to pay for items we must renegotiate, our freedom to further Canada's export interests through the new negotiations is ever more tightly circumscribed. This is true whether we wish to raise a bound Canadian tariff or simply withdraw a binding — other countries will insist on being paid for either of these actions. If the compensation we offer is inadequate, other contracting parties, notably the United States, will have the right to withdraw concessions we now enjoy.

My reading of the situation is that any significant unbinding of the Canadian tariff would quickly put us in a position where we would face compensatory withdrawals by other countries — and of course this would mean that we would have little or no scope for direct participation in the new negotiations. From the point of view of Trade and Commerce, this is indeed a blank outlook. To put it bluntly, unless the pressure to unbind important agricultural and possibly other tariffs is resisted, we will come out of this Conference with a good deal less favourable terms of access for our exports than we now have. We would face the withdrawal of valuable trade concessions by the United States, and our loss there would be in addition to the inevitable dilution of preferences in the United Kingdom and the difficulties we will face in maintaining our position in the Common Market, particularly in the field of agriculture. All this of course has important implications for our export income and our payments position at a time when we are concerned about our current account deficit.

Other than by virtue of being born on a bean and tobacco farm in Southwestern Ontario, I make no claim to expertise in Canadian agriculture. I have the strong feeling, however, that the present trend to increase the protection afforded our farmers may be ill-advised; it is certainly ill-timed from the point of view of our interests as an exporter.

As for soya beans, as I understand it, if the price of beans and oil were raised through tariff action, substitute products might well take over the market and the move to help the growers of soya beans prove self defeating. To spread the protection over the whole field of oils and seeds would have serious cost implications and would of course further impair our negotiating position with other countries; (and raise problems with our less developed Commonwealth partners). Moreover, there is the important preferential market for soya beans and soya bean products in the United Kingdom. The preference is small and an increase in Canadian prices might well mean the loss of this market to the United States and other suppliers. I doubt whether this loss could be wholly avoided through obtaining tariff drawback on soya beans imported from the United States. Drawback would not, for example, be of any assistance to our exports of soya beans as distinguished from the processed soya products. Another point to be considered is whether a tariff on soya beans would really help in dealing with our general agricultural problems. I fail to see how the proposed protection would help to deal with surplus wheat production. It seems to me that we might only find land switched to soya beans which is now being efficiently used — and profitably used — to grow tobacco and corn. But this sort of point is for others to argue who know agricultural economies better than I.

What I am sure about is that if we unbind soya beans and other agricultural items, we will not be able to compensate the United States without cutting into the level of protection for other sensitive agricultural products and/or impairing our important export market south of the border.

From the point of view of the interests of agricultural exporting countries, a move to increase agricultural protection in Canada at this time could hardly be more unfortunate. As a result of important decisions recently taken in the GATT, we are now joined with our trading partners in a joint offer to do something about the frustration of trade in agricultural products through measures of domestic protection. As a major agricultural exporter, our interest in this exercise is obvious. The success of this initiative is by no means assured and our capacity to bring the work to a fruitful conclusion will of course be greatly inhibited if domestically we now move in the reverse direction. Then there is the old question of the U.S. waiver. The Americans have in fact been reducing their reliance on this "out" and there is some hope that they could be persuaded to give it up in the context of a solution to the general problem of agricultural protectionism, or if such a move proved necessary in order to secure the opening of European markets, especially the Common Market, to U.S. agricultural exports. Prospects of influencing the United States in this direction would of course be undermined if we were to give our farmers more protection at this time.

Our capacity to persuade the Six to give Canada and other agricultural exporters reasonable terms of access to the Common Market would similarly be seriously reduced. The renegotiation of agricultural items previously bound to outside countries by one or other members of the Six promises to be the most difficult feature of our task here in the months to come. This will be made much more difficult if by our own action we appear to support the thesis that agriculture must be fully protected from the normal forces of international trade.

If we permit ourselves to be pushed into unbinding or seeking higher tariffs for soya beans and a range of other agricultural items, it seems to me that it will become difficult, if not impossible, to resist similar pressures from the manufacturing sector. If this were to happen, the problem of finding compensation in the Canadian tariff would be intensified and withdrawals of important concessions we now enjoy — and value — would become widespread and inevitable.

I do not argue that the present level of our tariff is necessarily the right one or that higher tariffs for some items may not have a role to play in furthering our economic well-being. I think, however, that the Government would be well advised to continue the policy of insisting on public hearings through the Tariff Board or otherwise before deciding to increase important tariff items. This procedure helps to insure that all the relevant factors are taken into account, including the interests of exporters, of consumers and of users of imported items. Moreover public hearings serve as a buffer between the Government and the particular pressures which are brought upon Ministers by one or other segment of industry or by particular companies. Incidentally it is not correct to think that the present period is the only time during which unbindings or tariff increases can be cleared through the GATT. Under the liberal interpretation of the "special circumstances" clause which now prevails, it is always possible to bring such requests before the Contracting Parties.

If without being satisfied that a move to give increased protection to a particular industry or sector is in the national interest, the Government were to yield to pressures for greater protection, it seems to me that we would be starting down a long and dangerous road, with no end to the claims which would be pressed on Ministers. We are living in a buyer's market and in a world which promises to become more rather than less competitive. In these circumstances should we embark on a policy which promises to increase our costs and undermine the position of our exports relative to that of our competitors? There must be measures other than industries in a position to enjoy an appropriate share of the domestic market, and to compete in markets abroad. If we insulate our economy through higher tariffs, we will build in outdated patterns of production and lose the flexibility and dynamism which it is so necessary to maintain in our day and age if we are to keep up technologically and otherwise with other countries throughout the world.

The way I see it more protection might be a temporary palliative for our secondary industry but surely if other countries move forward and we stand still or go back, the problem will only present itself again a few years hence in even more acute form.

I hope from what I have written you will not think of me as a dyed-in-the-wool free trader, unaware of the problems facing our farmers and manufacturers, and unconcerned about our unemployment, quite the contrary. What I wish to do however is to place before you a number of considerations which I think need to be borne in mind in thinking about the direction of our future commercial policy, if that policy is to serve the national interest as a whole in the years to come as well as in the period more immediately ahead. In recent months, attention has perhaps been unduly focussed on the difficult problem of foreign competition in our market. The briefs which Ministers have received have been pretty well in one direction. They have not been similarly exposed to the submissions made to our Department seeking improved access to foreign markets. The voice of the exporter and the consumer has not been sounded throughout the land.

Of course if a fair and objective consideration of all the interests involved dictates a policy of greater protection for certain sectors, then we must set accordingly. I trust, however, that, before we embark on a general course of higher tariff protection, the factors which have loomed less large in recent discussions, but which are of fundamental importance to our cost structure and to the long term health of our economy, will have been given the careful attention they deserve.

This letter has been discussed with Hector and the representatives of the other departments in the Delegation here. For whatever use they may be I am sending copies to those concerned in the Department of Finance, External Affairs and Agriculture, the Privy Council and the Bank of Canada.

Yours sincerely,
J.H. WARREN

TARIFF CONFERENCE SECOND AND THIRD WEEKS

As reported in our reference telegram the Tariff Conference at its meeting of September 6 agreed that in order to simplify and expedite the first phase of the negotiation, Contracting Parties should examine the bindings of the Common Tariff offered by the EEC and inform the Secretariat on a provisional basis of those items on which they found the internal compensation satisfactory. The renegotiations could then be focussed on the remaining items.

2. Although not repeat not enthusiastic about this procedure we have been proceeding with a product by product analysis of the offers beginning with those items (approximately 70) on which we have bindings from one or more of the Six which will be breached by the establishment of the Common Tariff. Our preliminary findings were that there were possibly ten, (mostly items of which we had had no repeat no exports to any of the Six in the past three years), on which we might be able to indicate we were satisfied. Of this first group the offers on all those items in which we had a substantive interest were unsatisfactory and in some cases nonexistent. There is a smaller second group of items in which we have principal supplier rights and no repeat no bindings. In addition there are of course offers by the Six where no repeat no binding is breached; these are therefore not repeat not up for renegotiations. Some items of importance to Canada fall in this category.

3. We had hoped to obtain clarification with regard to the offers on some specific items at an informal meeting of interested Contracting Parties with the Six on September 22. (You will recall that a decision to hold such a meeting was taken at the 16th Session.) Unfortunately the discussions were almost immediately diverted from specific items to the general methods used by the Six to reach their conclusion on the general incidence of the Common Tariff and eventually an unofficial Working Party as set up to discuss this question with them. Since we are anxious at this stage to avoid being drawn into discussions about the general incidence o the Common Tariff, we are not repeat not taking part in this exercise.

4. The September 23 meeting of the Tariff Conference was devoted mainly to reports from delegations on the progress which had been made in preparing lists of items on which they were tentatively satisfied with the Six's offer. In our statement we did not repeat not give an indication of whether we might in due course submit such a list to the Six or not repeat no Instead we stated that we were proceeding as rapidly as possible with our analysis of the proposals. Insofar as we were able to determine at present the offers made were mos unsatisfactory (this was especially the case in the field of agriculture) and we were not repea not even sure that they provided a basis on which negotiations could take place. However w proposed to continue with our study and as soon as it had been completed to arrange an earl meeting with the Six to discuss our findings (i.e. begin the Article XXIV-6 negotiations c specific commodities). We have emphasized to UK and USA delegations that the EEC offer us is far from satisfactory as there is some risk that our position could be undercut by then

5. Our attempt thus to bypass the procedures agreed to in the earlier Tariff Conferen meetings appears to have been successful and the outcome of the September 23 meeti although the point was never made explicitly was that delegations which do not repeat n have extensive lists of items are free to open negotiations as soon as they see fit and witho going through the procedure of setting aside acceptable items. We are accordingly proceedi with our analysis of those items on which we have a principal supplier or substantial intere Our present assessment is that we will probably have our first meetings with the EI sometime next week. In the meantime we are devoting much of our effort to checking w other delegations who hold bindings in which we have an interest or who have an interest items in which we hold bindings.

REQUEST LIST ON THE SIX

In the light of the USA decision to submit their request list on the Six and your discussions with Campbell Smith we have prepared a list of items which might be included in the Canadian request list. We of course would leave it to you to decide on the basis of your own assessment of the best negotiating posture as to whether and, if so, when a request list should be submitted. We would also expect that you may wish to modify any list either by the inclusion of additional items or the deletion of ones suggested by us on the basis of the negotiations so far.

2. In preparing our list we have included agricultural items and you will no doubt wish to consider these in the context of the overall agricultural problem. In this respect we have particularly in mind that tariff concessions alone would not be adequate to assure access of Canadian products in the light of the other restrictive devices that may be developed in the field of agriculture. We have omitted items which are bound free to us and show duty free entry in the proposed Common Tariff on the assumption that these would be rebound in the paragraph six negotiations. The list is arranged in order of tariff items.

3. Following is the suggested list: EX 03.02 salted cod, EX 04.02 powdered skim milk, 10.01 wheat, 10.02 rye, 10.03 barley, 10.04 oats, EX 11.01 flour of wheat, EX 12.03 hybrid clover seed (alsike), EX 12.03 grass seeds, EX 16.04 canned salmon, EX 17.02 maple syrup, EX 22.09 whisky, 24.01 tobacco, EX 29.04 pentaerythritol, EX 29.11 vanillin, EX 39.01 polyamide resins (nylon flake), EX 39.02 polystyrene, polyethylene, polyvinylchloride, EX 44.05 wood coniferous sawn lengthwise, EX 47.01 woodpulp for papermaking, EX 48.01 newsprint paper, EX 74.03 copper bars, profiles etc., 76.01 aluminum primary, 79.01 zinc primary, EX 83.15 radio wireless apparatus (air navigation equipment), EX 84.52 calculating machines.

4. We have omitted oil seeds, a Common Agricultural Policy item, because the Common Tariff schedule provides for duty free entry and there are existing bindings to Canada by Italy and France on flaxseed.

5. If you think that it would be desirable to have the list also submitted in the capitals of the Six, our missions to EEC countries should be informed accordingly.

Ottawa, October 7, 1960

CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL TRADE WITH EUROPE

The future of our agricultural exports to Europe is of such importance that we thought i essential to bring you up to date on recent developments. This review is extensive but bears o important issues now before Cabinet.

You will recall that, as the result of a Canadian initiative, the five major agricultura exporters (the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Argentina), met in June wit the Six individually to discuss the proposals of the EEC Commission for a Commo Agricultural Policy (CAP). The Commission had recommended that a common market i agriculture among the Six be achieved principally by the merger of national marketin organizations, the establishment of uniform support prices, and the protection of domesti production from import competition. While a CAP based on these proposals and carried out i a liberal way could bridge existing discrepancies between price and productivity levels amon the Six and encourage the modernization and rationalization of their agriculture, the maj agricultural exporters had reasons to be concerned about the adverse impact this policy woul have on their agricultural exports to the Six, if it were implemented with high supports behin protective walls. The consultations provided them with the opportunity of impressing th concern upon the Six and of making it clear that they expected assurance of adequate access the EEC market on a competitive basis and known terms. Since then certain developmen have served to sharpen the issues raised for Canada by the adoption of a CAP by the Six.

There is increasing evidence that a CAP could now only be achieved at the cost of hi internal support if decisions are taken by the Six before next year's general elections Germany. German agriculture, with high production costs and an almost feudal charact enjoys extensive support and protection which have been given for reasons that are chief social and political. It is now fairly clear that the present German Government, with its stro rural backing, is not prepared to accept, at least for the time being, a CAP which would p German agriculture under severely increased competition; but the price which would have be paid by the EEC generally and its trading partners for a CAP based on high levels protection and support, could be considerable. A CAP of this kind would encoura uneconomical protection, bid up EEC food prices, require the curtailment of agricultu imports and possibly result in the accumulation of bothersome agricultural surpluses within t EEC, which would have to be disposed of on world markets. The Six thus have reached t point where they must face difficult policy issues such as how soon should a start be made the implementation of the CAP, which level of internal support will make it politically feasi to carry it out, and what concessions should be given their main trading partners in order forestall possible retaliation.

Since June the agricultural exporters, for their part, have used every opportunity to impr again on the Six their concern about the adverse effects some of the proposed policies co have on their agricultural exports to the Community. They have indicated that they could easily enter into extensive tariff negotiations with the Six at the GATT Tariff Confere without precise knowledge of the EEC's future terms of access for these agricultural expo The United States' concern about any failure of the Six to take third party interests adequat into account in working out the CAP, was restated with particular vigour by Secretary Benson during a visit to several capitals of the Six in August, and in the opening statement of the United States delegation to the Tariff Conference in Geneva.

This firm stand is showing some results. The French recently asked the Secretary-General of the GATT to approach Canada, the United States, Australia and New Zealand and to find out how they would react to offers of long-term contracts with the Six on agricultural commodities. This is the first indication that the Six may have second thoughts about the wisdom of maintaining, as they had done persistently, that they can give agricultural exporters no assurance on terms of access to the EEC until the CAP has been fully developed. The four exporters concerned responded to the French approach by reiterating their request for adequate access to the EEC on a competitive basis and known terms and stating that they were prepared to consider whatever proposals the Six might put forward to insure this access; of the four countries approached by the French, the United States made perhaps the least forthcoming response. In their view, offers of long-term contracts were not good enough. The quantitative formula of the kind envisaged in the French suggestion would, they thought, set a pattern for the future and undermine the United States' known stand on trading and agriculture by encouraging pressures from underdeveloped countries for similar arrangements, and requests in the United States for quantitative limitations on imports into the United States market. In their judgment, continuing pressure on the Six from the agricultural exporters for adequate access into the Common Market was likely to prove the best way of influencing the level of EEC support of agriculture. We understand that while the French approach may have been largely unauthorized, the French officials now intend to consult with key officials among the Six in the light of these reactions and to develop further views during the months of October.

While the prospects for the CAP thus remain uncertain, it is quite clear that the agricultural exporters should refrain from any action that might weaken their position and impair their ability to influence the Six, now that the Six are nearing important decisions and showing signs of responding at last to external pressures. The issues at stake go much beyond the prospects for agricultural exports into the EEC. Failure on the part of the Six to develop a sound CAP might severely limit the scope of the entire GATT tariff negotiations which the United States and Canada regard as the most promising means of bridging, at least for the time being, the gap between the Six and the Seven, and from which Canada hopes to reap some trade benefits itself; they might impair GATT efforts presently under way to encourage freer international trade in agricultural commodities and encourage distortions which could hamper the implementation of the Rome Treaty and strain the future trading relationship between the EEC and other world traders. In view of recent United Kingdom initiatives on association with the Six, this possible turn of events would appear to be all the more disturbing, as acceptance of some form of common agricultural market with the EEC might eventually be part of the price the United Kingdom would have to pay in order to join it.

The strong and effective stand the United States have taken on the CAP, which is largely responsible for the reaction of the Six, has only been achieved as a result of a delicate assessment of the relative importance of their industrial and agricultural interests in the EEC and against their traditional disposition to be lenient with the Six for political reasons. The foundations for their stand might therefore be more precarious than they appear to be and care must be exercised not to undermine them. The United States criticism of the CAP has also been somewhat inhibited by their own agricultural waiver, which the Six could regard as an excuse for developing among themselves protectionist trading arrangements in agriculture. But the United States are now making progress in removing restrictions covered by this waiver and the possibility of relinquishing it altogether is now being seriously considered among United States officials. Perhaps the practical significance of such a move and indeed of the waiver itself should not be over-estimated in view of the great restraint with which the United States have used it; perhaps there might be some danger too in injecting this issue into a settlement with the Six as a quid pro quo which the United States might eventually find politically impossible to deliver; it seems nonetheless desirable to encourage this trend and provide the United States with no excuse for a retreat.

The meaning of these developments for Canada is that every effort should now be made to resist the trend to help Canadian agriculture through an increase in protection. You will recall that when the Cabinet approved instructions for the Canadian delegation to the GATT Tariff Conference reference was made to the need for considering further the possibility of unbinding certain agricultural items in the Canadian tariff, notably soya beans. We understand that proposals to this effect may fairly soon be put before the Cabinet. But such proposals are not only ill-timed from the point of view of our interests as a major exporter, they could be ill-advised as well. Any significant unbinding in the Canadian tariff would surely mean that our ability to persuade the Six to give Canada and other agricultural exporters reasonable terms of access to the common market, and our means of influencing their CAP would be considerably reduced. We would find it increasingly difficult to lend effective support to the strong stand the United States are taking with the Six at our own urging. By appearing to support the view that agriculture must be fully protected from the normal forces of international trade, we would provide one more excuse for protectionism elsewhere and perhaps help to convince other agricultural exporters like New Zealand and Australia, who have so far formed a common front with us, that their exporting interests would best be served by bilateral deals with the Six. Moreover, if we unbind soya beans and other agricultural items, we shall soon have to face compensatory withdrawals of concessions by other countries; our important United States markets will be impaired and we shall be unable to offer adequate compensation to the United States without cutting into the level of protection for other sensitive agricultural products. In any event our scope for direct participation in the new GATT tariff negotiations will be correspondingly reduced. These prospects are serious when we face the inevitable dilution of preferences in the United Kingdom, the problem of maintaining our export position in the common market, long term issues of competition and balance of payments and requests for protection from many other sectors of the Canadian economy, which would become that much more difficult to deny. In brief, if we do not resist now proposals for the increased protection of domestic agriculture, we shall be disregarding the significance of developments in Europe and sacrificing concrete and long term Canadian interests for a temporary and perhaps illusory relief. It could be the start down a long and dangerous road.

EEC AGRICULTURE — GATT TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

While in Paris I took the opportunity to refer to confidential discussions in Geneva and Washington and to emphasize with Clappier and Valéry (in Wormser's absence) the critical importance of the Six coming forward with realistic proposals in the field of agriculture which would provide genuine access to the markets of the Six.

2. I made it clear that for us and other overseas agricultural exporters the possibility of successful renegotiations and new negotiations would turn on this issue. I indicated also how failure to deal adequately with agriculture would affect the USA position, both as regards the Dillon negotiations and the direction of USA agricultural and commercial policy. I added, on the basis of what Wyndham-White had told me of his talks with the Americans in Washington, that the USA attitude of general support for the EEC might also be called into question if the Six did not repeat not take adequately into account the interests of third countries in the agricultural sector.

3. Both Clappier and Valéry showed full appreciation of the necessities of the situation and we may take it that so far as the French are concerned the conversations with Wyndham-White and with USA officials have had the desired effect. While admitting, even emphasizing, the need for a satisfactory solution, Clappier and Valéry are appalled at the difficulties of securing agreement among their partners on arrangements which might be considered adequate by outside countries. It was not repeat not simply a question of the German attitude but the whole range of problems which present themselves in moving towards a common market in the agricultural sector. In particular it is felt that it will be impossible to arrive at solutions concerning tariffs and other barriers to trade which could be agreed with interested third countries before the end of the year.

4. While recognizing the difficulties, I emphasized the urgency from the point of view of the renegotiations of bringing constructive proposals forward as soon as possible — the initiative and the responsibility lay with the Six. I thought that once the Six had indicated a genuine willingness to find ways and means of protecting the interests of third countries and had come forward with their ideas there would be a willingness on the part of the interested contracting parties to explore, on a very confidential basis, the possibilities for a settlement which might exist. However, the Six would have to go a long way beyond the quite unsatisfactory current offer of temporary and incomplete bindings and should try to find measures which would approximate much more closely the traditional terms of commercial access than Wahl's informal suggestion of long-term contracts.

5. Clappier confirmed that he will in the very near future be making contact with his opposite numbers in the Six to underline the seriousness of the situation, to seek agreement on the need to find an answer and to explore ways and means. Beyond maintaining firm pressure in Geneva and elsewhere, it would seem that little more can be done until Clappier has completed these consultations.

6. I was struck once again, as in July, with the depth and intensity of French determination that a common market should be achieved in the agricultural sector. This is a sine qua non of French support for the treaty and both Clappier and Valéry made it clear that the European economic community would not repeat not survive if the treaty obligations with respect to agriculture were not repeat not implemented.

7. Although it can be argued that Canada's position as an agricultural exporter to Europe might be better if efforts to bring about a common market in agriculture were to fail (and this is an open question, given the strong tendencies of national protectionism which exists in the countries of the Six), I think we must work on the assumption that if the Rome Treaty is to survive the Six countries will in fact move towards common agricultural arrangements. In these circumstances it seems to me that our efforts must primarily be directed towards ensuring that the agricultural régime is as liberal as possible. In this connection the pressures which can be exerted by outside countries through the Geneva negotiations appear to give the greatest promise of circumscribing the protective impact of the internal arrangements which may be proposed. In this regard Clappier mentioned the possibility that the commercial policy and other external aspects of agriculture in the Six might be developed in parallel with and have their influence on the common policies being considered in Brussels. Against this there is of course the danger that by forcing the pace through the tariff negotiations and so supporting French and Dutch efforts to make early progress towards a common agricultural policy compromises will be made with the protectionist elements in the Six concerning support levels and other restrictive arrangements which will be of lasting damage to outside countries. I am inclined to doubt, however, whether this danger is such that we should forego the opportunity presented by the current tariff negotiations and by the current firm attitude of USA to exert maximum influence on the Six to adopt policies and techniques of protection which can be reconciled with the interests of agricultural exporting countries.

REQUEST LIST ON THE SIX

We are grateful to you for indicating to us the items which you would wish to see included in Canada's request list on the Six. As the renegotiations proceed we will be in a better position to offer our suggestions concerning possible amendments. We remain of the view that it would be tactically unwise to submit our request at this stage.

2. Corse will be submitting USA request list in the next few days. In order to minimize possible prejudice to USA renegotiations no repeat no rates will however be indicated. List will be accompanied by explicit reservations concerning the renegotiations and the right to submit amendments. It will be stated in addition that in the negotiations and renegotiations in respect of agricultural items USA will have to be satisfied that access to the common market is not repeat not to be frustrated by non repeat non tariff barriers to trade.

ARTICLE XXIV: 6 RENEGOTIATIONS

Following is text of aide mémoire which we handed to EEC Delegation at the conclusion of yesterday's meeting. French representative subsequently informed us that he would take a copy with him to a high level Six meeting on agriculture on the context of Article XXIV:6 renegotiations which is being held in Paris today. We have also been given to understand that the statement contained in our reference telegram has already been transmitted to the Commission and the Six national governments.

Text of aide mémoire begins:

The Canadian Delegation welcomes the opportunity presented by the renegotiations under Article XXIV to meet with the representatives of the EEC. In accordance with the terms of Article XXIV:6 these renegotiations have as their objective the maintenance and effective implementation between Canada and the EEC of a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous trade concessions no repeat no less favourable than those negotiated between Canada and the member countries of the Community under the general agreement prior to the proposed introduction of the EEC common tariff.

Traditionally Canada has been an important trade partner of the six EEC countries. In recent years the trade has greatly expanded in both directions. These close and growing commercial relations reinforce and are related to the intimate political and military links which bind our countries. Recently Canadian exports to the EEC countries have been at the rate of dollars 300 million to dollars 400 million annually, representing about 8 per cent of Canada's total export trade. The European Economic Community is Canada's third largest market. For a number of key Canadian products the Common Market has been taking a third or more of total Canadian export sales. Canada, as a country, is one of the largest markets for manufactured goods in the world. It is a rapidly growing market for the exports of the EEC. Exports of the Six countries to Canada rose from about dollars 55 million in 1950 to a total of over dollars 300 million in 1959 — an increase of over 500 per cent. It is of great importance both to the Community and to Canada that the trade between us should in the future expand on a fair and reciprocally advantageous basis.

Article XXIV of the General Agreement provides that the purpose of a customs union should be to facilitate trade between the constituent territories. Equally it is provided that this purpose should be accomplished without raising barriers to the trade of other contracting parties. Paragraph 6 of Article XXIV lays down specific obligations and procedures for the renegotiation of items in respect of which the proposed level of a common tariff is higher than any of the rates preciously bound to outside contracting parties under Article II of the agreement by individual members of a proposed customs union. In order to ensure that the balance of reciprocal concessions between Canada and the Community is not repeat not impaired through the introduction of the European common tariff it is essential that full and effective use be made of the current renegotiations.

The Canadian Delegation has reviewed the offer list of the EEC in respect of items on which Canada has negotiating rights under paragraph 6 of Article XXIV. This review has indicated that the offer of the Community is quite unsatisfactory from Canadian point of view. Only a very few items, and none of any great significance to Canadian trade can be regarded as acceptable from the standpoint of "internal compensation." Out of the remaining 86 items with respect to which Canada has negotiating rights, there is no repeat no offer in the case of some 49 items bound to Canada by one or more members of the EEC. As to other cases, the Canadian Delegation does not repeat not regard the offer of the EEC as acceptable. Indeed, for a large number of these items the EEC itself recognizes that the proposed common tariff does not repeat not represent sufficient compensation for the upward movement of national rates previously bound at lower levels. In fact, about 70 percent of exports in respect of which Canada has contractual rights with the EEC countries would be impaired by the proposed common tariff. It is clear that possible tariff reductions on the rest of Canada's exports could not repeat not offer adequate compensation for this impairment.

For agriculture the position is particularly unsatisfactory. It would appear that in this sector the Community has not repeat not attempted to establish terms of access corresponding to those paid for by Canada and other contracting parties in previous negotiations with the individual members of the EEC. Certain offers to bind tariffs have been made, but only for a limited number of products. For a few of these the tariff may be the effective instrument of protection, but for others the tariff may be nullified by other measures restrictive of trade. From Canadian point of view a settlement which failed satisfactorily to cover such important elements in Canada's trade with the Community would not repeat not be acceptable. The Canadian Delegation considers it essential to the restoration of a satisfactory balance of concessions that the Community assume and implement meaningful obligations in the agricultural sector, so vital to Canada's trade, accounting as it does for over 40 per cent of Canadian exports to the EEC.

The Canadian Delegation does not repeat not consider that the current offer of the Six as regards agricultural trade as a whole represents a realistic approach to the renegotiations. It is Canadian view that the Community should urgently reconsider its position in this matter and bring forward additional and revised offers promising genuine access to the Common Market on reasonable and known terms. Until progress has been made in this direction the Canadian Delegation doubts the practicability of conducting detailed renegotiations. Conscious, however, of the short time available and in the expectation that the Community will as an urgent matter bring forward improved offers with respect to agriculture, the members of the Delegation are, at this stage, prepared to meet with representatives of the Commission for a discussion and exchange of views with respect to the times of concern to Canada in the renegotiations.

The Canadian Delegation has noted that the offer list of the Community involves only the binding of some but by no repeat no means all the items in the common tariff. No repeat no offers have been made to reduce tariffs below the level initially proposed. In the course of the renegotiations the Canadian government will expect the Community to offer reductions, as well as the binding, of tariff levels of interest to Canada. This is essential to the restoration of a satisfactory balance of concessions in view of the relatively narrow range of Canada's sales to the Community and the increased protection which the common tariff as proposed would involve for main Canadian export items. While a linear reduction in the level of the proposed common tariff would be welcome, particularly to countries with a wide range of exports to the Common Market this, in itself, would not repeat not necessarily meet legitimate Canadian interests. In the view of Canadian Government a final settlement must include not repeat not only satisfactory arrangements for agricultural trade but also the binding of tariffs of real interest to Canada in the raw material and industrial fields at levels which would not repeat not involve increased barriers to Canadian sales to the Community.

In view of the great importance to Canada and to the EEC of the maintenance of satisfactory relationships between us and the expansion of our mutual trade the Canadian Delegation is confident that despite the difficulties the renegotiations between Canada and the Community can be brought to a successful conclusion.

Dear Bob [Latimer],

I regret the delay in replying to your letter of October 5th[124] concerning the renegotiations and new negotiations. I had put it aside for reflection and as usual when I do this days and weeks slip by in magnificent inaction. Please forgive me.

We are indeed grateful for the comments which you and the others in the Branch have forwarded to us from time to time. Your letters are circulated to Wilf[125] and Mickey[126] and in due course the suggestions made find their reflection in our discussions with negotiating c.p.'s. Keep up the good work! You are better equipped in Ottawa than we are here to spot particular commodity developments which may be relevant to one or another phase of the negotiations.

I have discussed in the Delegation your question about the preparation of additional request lists, particularly on Commonwealth countries. There is no fixed deadline for the submission of request lists, but, as you know, it is customary to put them in in time to give the countries concerned an opportunity to consider the matter and prepare offers. I think you can safely assume that if we were now to decide to seek negotiations with certain of these countries our request lists would not be rejected on the basis of late submission.

The more difficult question is whether, in the light of our limited bargaining power, it would be useful to go ahead and prepare new request lists. We are not really in a position to take this decision here in Geneva. The ultimate answer as to whether or not there is scope in the Canadian tariff to pay for new concessions from Commonwealth countries must be settled in discussion with Finance in the light of Trade and Commerce representations that there are significant trading advantages to be gained through tariff reductions by the countries concerned. In this connection, it has occurred to us, however, that the sorts of concessions which Canada might be willing to make to secure benefit from the United States and the Six are unlikely to be of the nature as those which might be of interest to tropical Commonwealth countries. Thus negotiations with such countries would not necessarily cut into the limited supply of chips we have for the big hands. Similarly it seems unlikely that the sorts of concessions which these countries would seek in the Canadian Tariff would be of concern to Canadian industry, since in large part their exports are not competitive with Canadian production.

With these two considerations in mind, my conclusion is that it would be worthwhile for you to prepare limited and realistic request lists on at least some of the countries you have mentioned and present them for interdepartmental discussion. I should think that in such discussions Finance might find it rather easier to agree to seek for equivalent concessions than if it were a case of proposed negotiations with additional temperate zone or industrialized countries.

All best wishes,

Yours sincerely,
J.H. WARREN

ARTICLE XXIV:6 RENEGOTIATIONS

We have now completed our first reading with EEC of all the items not repeat not initially eliminated from Article XXIV:6 renegotiations. At our final meeting this afternoon we presented them with an aide mémoire summarizing the major points which we have made in these discussions. Appended to this aide mémoire was a list comprising the major items in Canadian trade with EEC and an indication of what we might consider to be a satisfactory settlement in respect of each item. In view of the provisional and sensitive nature of this list, we are not repeat not however transmitting it with this message.

Following is the text of our aide mémoire: Text Begins

The Canadian Delegation and the Delegation of EEC have completed their preliminary exchange of views concerning items in the proposed common tariff in respect of which Canada has negotiating rights under Article XXIV, para 6, as well as those in respect of which EEC Delegation considers that Canada's contractual position would be improved if proffered bindings of common tariff rates of interest to Canada were accepted.

This review has reinforced the conviction of Canadian delegation that the Commission of EEC should substantially involve its offers in respect of a considerable number of items of particular importance to Canadian trade if the requirements of Article XXIV are to be fulfilled and if a mutually satisfactory settlement is to be reached under Article XXIV, paragraph 6. This is true of numerous industrial items but is particularly vital in the agricultural sector.

As regards agriculture, Canadian Delegation wishes to recall the various statements made by Mr. H.B. McKinnon at the Tariff Negotiations Committee, and the aide mémoire given to the Delegation of EEC on October 20/60. These emphasized that a settlement which did not repeat not take account of all elements of Canada's trade with the Community would not repeat not be tolerable from Canadian point of view; thus any final settlement must comprise satisfactory arrangements for both agricultural and industrial items. For wheat, accounting annually for over 100 million dollars of Canadian exports to EEC, and for cheddar cheese, the Commission has offered only one-year bindings. In the Canadian view these represent little more than a postponement of the renegotiations and are quite unsatisfactory. No repeat no offers have been made for a number of significant Canadian exports, for example, coarse grains, buckwheat, grain screenings and apples. For many other items, for example, frozen and mild cured salmon, canned salmon, canned lobster, eels, hybrid seed corn, and seeds for sowing, rates for the common tariff have been proposed which are unreasonably high and would represent increases in trade barriers relative to the tariff bindings and terms of access previously enjoyed by Canada. For many items, these unreasonably high proposed rates have come about through the inclusion in the averaging of national tariffs of prohibitively high rates of duty maintained by one or more of the member countries. This has resulted in an undesirable distortion from the common sense trade point of view (the same distortion occurs in respect of numerous industrial items). Canadian Delegation is confident that the Commission will take all the above considerations fully into account in revising its current offers with respect to agricultural products, and that the representatives of the Community will come forward with firm offers in respect of important Canadian agricultural exports for which either no repeat no offer has yet been made or only temporary one-year bindings proposed. It is essential that such offers should provide for continuing access to the Common Market over reasonable, clearly defined and bound levels of protection which would permit an acceptable degree of competition between imported and domestically produced products and which would not repeat not be frustrated by non-tariff barriers to trade not repeat not permitted under the General Agreement.

As regards industrial products, Canadian Delegation invites attention to the following general considerations:

1. The bulk of Canada's trade has been in the field of raw materials. This trade has been mainly with the low-tariff countries and has entered their markets duty-free or at very low rates of duty. The lowering of higher tariffs to the proposed level of the Common Tariff would not repeat not in the Canadian view compensate for increased rates in the lower tariff countries which will have a direct adverse effect on the greater part of Canadian trade with EEC in these materials.

2. For many items of interest to Canada, the extension to the whole of the Community of present bindings of duty-free entry or low rates of duty does not repeat not offer any real prospect of increased trade. The extension of these bindings could not repeat not, therefore, be regarded as adequate compensation for the raising of tariffs on other important items which would impair Canada's access to the markets of EEC.

3. So far as essential raw materials are concerned, duty-free entry or very low rates of duty are a natural outcome of the formation of a common market between highly industrialized countries which are not repeat not themselves large producers of such materials. In evaluating any credit which may be due to the Community for the extension of duty-free entry for raw materials it will be relevant to Canadian judgement that it is in the economic interests of the Six to obtain their raw materials as cheaply as possible.

4. In assessing the degree of real protection represented by a proposed tariff level, account must be taken of the size of an economics of production within the market involved. Thus the same degree of real protection which is assured by a given rate of duty in a small market, where domestic competition with imports is relatively limited, can be achieved in a large market by a lower rate of duty. It follows that in moving from four individual markets to a large single market, the same level of real protection can be achieved through rates of duty lower than those previously applied. Accordingly, if increased barriers to trade are to be avoided the common tariff rates should be significantly lower than the incidence of previous national rates, without thereby giving rise to any claim for credit by the Community in relation to outside contracting parties.

In accordance with the agreed procedures for renegotiations under Article XXVIII, Canada must be the judge of the adequacy of compensation offered for impaired rights, both from the point of view of the products involved and the tariff rates which may be proposed. The range of Canadian exports to EEC is relatively limited; it is what happens to the terms of access for these products which must determine the final Canadian attitude to the renegotiations. There are many elements of more real significance than statistical and historical criteria which must enter into the judgement of the extent to which implementation of the proposed common tariff will adversely affect the commercial advantage to which Canada is entitled in the markets of the Six as a result of concessions obtained and paid for in previous negotiations and in accordance with the requirements of Article XXIV. A strictly mathematical approach based solely on the amount of trade covered by previous bindings will not repeat not provide an adequate basis for negotiations leading to a satisfactory settlement with Canada, despite the fact that such an approach would in itself demonstrate a considerable impairment of Canada's rights.

In addition to the important considerations set out in this aide mémoire, the Delegation of EEC will have noted other significant points developed by Canadian Delegation in the course of the recent exchange of views. Text Ends.

2. EEC Delegation will be returning to Brussels next week to report to the Commission on the results of their first readings with various delegations. They will then proceed to a re-examination of their original offer and will return to Geneva on January 4 with their "definitive" offer. Our expectation is that the presentation of this revised offer by EEC will mark the opening of the real Article XXIV:6 renegotiations.

EEC AGRICULTURAL POLICY — TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

1. We met confidentially Saturday with Mansholt and USA representatives. Mansholt was accompanied by Rabot Meyer-Burckhardt and Donne, Chief Negotiator for the Commission here in Geneva. Corse was accompanied by Zaglitz and Warren and Richards were with me.

2. Mansholt opened the discussion by saying that considerable progress had been made in securing acceptance in principle of the Commission's proposals for a common agricultural policy particularly the system of variable levies since he had met with agricultural exporters last June and July. An important stage had now been reached in the deliberations concerning the CAP. As reported by Brussels the Council meeting of December 7 had not repeat not been decisive but the way now seemed clear despite numerous difficulties for decisions concerning both industrial and agricultural acceleration to be taken at the Council meeting scheduled for December 19. In the Special Committee a good measure of agreement was already present concerning solutions to the problems of distortion of internal competition and for the applications of an internal levy system during the transitional period. This was true also of the introduction of a system of variable levies as the sole normal measure of protection against outside competition at the stage when the common policy could actually be applied for the various products. (Mansholt was not repeat not precise as to whether for certain products a tariff plus variable levy was now envisaged or whether only the variable levy would apply.)

3. Mansholt's optimism concerning the December 19 meeting is based on the one hand on the progress which has been made in securing acceptance of the concepts and techniques advocated by the Commission and on the other hand by the fact that agreement to make progress in the agricultural sector must be reached if the agricultural exporters of the Six, particularly France, are to implement the acceleration with respect to industrial items scheduled for January 1. If the December 19 meeting goes as Mansholt expects the Commission will be asked within the next year to submit definitive and detailed plans for the achievement of a common market for the different commodities concerned. For example the proposals with respect to pork would be tabled not repeat not later than March 31 and those for wheat by May 31. The expectation would be that within a year thereafter the common system would be started including application of variable levies to outside countries. Thus the introduction of the agricultural common market would be staggered over the next two to three years commodity by commodity as agreement on details of the systems to be applied was reached.

4. Mansholt argued that in present circumstances, then for political reasons the German government could neither accept an immediate reduction in the price of wheat nor a public obligation that cereal prices in Germany would be progressively reduced to an economic level. The scope which the Six and the Commission had for negotiating a settlement with outside countries was very severely limited. In fact the Commission really required a deconsolidation of tariff obligations for the important agricultural products in order to bring about the common agricultural policy proposed. In his view the matter boiled down so far as cereals were concerned to a choice between a variable levy with no repeat no other barriers to trade together with a support level which would take account of import availabilities and export possibilities or continuance of the present situation of traditional tariff obligations completely frustrated by various other limitations, mixing regulations, state trading, quantitative restrictions, etc. Nonetheless the Commission was aware of the exigencies of the tariff negotiations and of the need to find some solution which might be satisfactory to the agricultural exporting countries. In his own mind two hypothetical possibilities existed. First a binding of the maximum level of the variable levy or secondly the undertaking by the Community and Community countries of minimum purchase obligations related to past sales. The first of these he rejected as impossible since the German government could not repeat not in present circumstances accept an obligation which would clearly be seen to require a substantial reduction in German support prices. Accordingly his conclusion was that the best solution for the next few years would be acceptance by the Six of quantitative import commitments.

5. Corse was extremely cautious in commenting on this exposé sheltering behind the fact that Mansholt would be seeing senior agricultural officials in Washington on Monday. He reiterated USA dissatisfaction with the current offer of the EEC which envisages deconsolidations for coarse grains and other products of importance to USA agriculture and so-called one year bindings for wheat and other products. He explained to Mansholt that there were psychological as well as real barriers to USA acceptance of the principle of variable levies in international trade. As regards the assumption by the Six of quantitative obligations his reaction was unenthusiastic but he indicated that the possibilities would no repeat no doubt have to be considered. Corse referred to the firm position of USA concerning the agricultural sector as put forward by Clarence Randall at the opening meeting of the Tariff Conference and of the need to find a settlement acceptable to USA. While Corse's presentation was less forceful and precise than we would have liked we may assume that those present from the Commission are aware of the critical importance which USA attaches to this problem.

6. We referred to the position taken by Canada with respect to agriculture in the Tariff Conference and in our various aide mémoires and asserted the necessity of finding solutions acceptable to the agricultural exporters if the renegotiations were to be successfully concluded and if the new negotiations were to hold real promise. We contrasted the difficulties which the Commission is having in securing German cooperation with the political and economic consequence which might flow from failure of the Six to reach agreement with their trading partners with respect to agricultural items. We told Mansholt that a generalized and permanent quantitative solution might represent a very damaging precedent for international trade and argued that the Commission should come forward with proposals which would provide for continuing access to the market of the community at reasonable and known levels of protection permitting competition between the imported and domestically produced product and which would not repeat not be frustrated by non tariff barriers to trade. Speaking personally Warren drew a distinction between variable levies and such and variable levies with a maximum. He enquired whether a system of the kind discussed in Ottawa could not repeat not be considered whereby the Community would agree to a reasonable maximum level of protection which would prevail when the common policy was introduced and progressive movement toward that position during the interim period through gradual lowering of the maximum levy which could be applied by the individual members starting from the basis of the differences between landed prices of imported wheat and the domestic support prices presently prevailing in the various countries. Mansholt replied that while such a system was attractive conceptually and would reinforce his efforts to secure the required reduction in internal Community prices such a proposal was a non starter since it would require immediate and public German acceptance of the downward movement of prices to an agreed maximal level by the beginning of the definitive period.

7. We continued to insist that the Commission should come forward with an offer which could serve as the basis for fruitful negotiations in January. After a good deal of discussion back and forth Mansholt indicated interest in a combined solution along the following lines. Firstly for a three year period the Community and/or the national units would assume a minimum commitment to purchase from the agricultural exporters related to trade in a base period. This would be a temporary solution to cover the forthcoming bound tariff period and the years in which the common markets for the different agricultural products would be progressively introduced. Secondly the Community would undertake that at the end of three years (which would correspond with the next negotiating stage in the GATT) the Community would negotiate maximum levels for the variable levies to be applied to different products and would give assurances that the maximum levy would not repeat not be frustrated by non tariff barriers to trade. We made the point that a general undertaking to negotiate the maximum level of protection would probably not repeat not of itself be acceptable and as a minimum would have to be accompanied by an undertaking that the level to be negotiated would be such as to provide access on terms which would permit the continuation and expansion of trade and competition between the imported and domestically produced product. Mansholt accepted the validity of this point but did not repeat not undertake to incorporate it in any revised offer which the Community may make. We also suggested that reservation of the definitive renegotiations for a three year period might have to be accompanied by reservations concerning the tariff to be applied by outside countries to products of interest to the Community.

8. We think it may now be assumed that the Community will be making a substantially revised offer in the agricultural sector during the course of the renegotiations since the Council of Ministers on December 19 must take difficult decisions concerning internal acceleration in the agricultural sector. Mansholt does not repeat not envisage that it will be possible at that time to define and refine the revised offer to be made to outside countries for purposes of the renegotiations. He expects that at the earliest this could be dealt with at the first meeting of the Council in January. Accordingly the revised offer which the Six will be bringing to the Contracting Parties after the recess will probably still fail to cover grains and other important agricultural imports where no repeat no offers or only temporary offers have so far been made. In the circumstances we told Donne that while we would be prepared to discuss with him revised industrial offers and those with respect to our marginal agricultural exports it would be impossible for us to conclude renegotiations with respect to such items pending negotiation of their revised offer for our major agricultural exports. Donne seemed to accept that this was not repeat not unreasonable.

9. In these informal discussions we made it clear that we were not repeat not renegotiating but simply exploring possibilities which might exist. I however expressed my disappointment with the rigidity of the position as explained by Mansholt and indicated that if a satisfactory settlement could not repeat not be reached in the agricultural sector a number of things which might have been possible so far as Canada was concerned would become impossible. We emphasized also that the Six should remember in looking at their internal difficulties that action which impaired the trading position of outside countries could not repeat not be viewed in isolation but that as in the physical world action would inevitably be followed by reaction. Although the position is far from satisfactory it does seem that the pressure which has been brought to bear with respect to agriculture is beginning to yield some results in terms of the willingness of the Community to come forward with revised proposals which would go some way to meet our requirements and those of other agricultural exporters. It of course remains to be seen whether Mansholt who is basically well disposed can bring the representatives of the Six to agree to make a reasonable offer from which we could negotiate.

10. Our assessment is that failing USA pressure of a kind which would move Chancellor Adenauer to take the political risks inherent in a reversal of his government's position on internal support prices we cannot repeat not expect to reach at this stage a fully satisfactory long term settlement with the Six. Indeed there are dangers that a forced settlement in the next couple of months would have to be at the price of accepting long term protection in Europe at undesirably high levels. You are in a better position than we to judge whether the Americans through major political pressure could force a real change in the German position in the context of renegotiations. In the light of the reception of Anderson and Dillon's recent initiative in Bonn[127] we are somewhat sceptical whether the Americans would go this far with the Germans and whether even if they did the desired results could be obtained. Regretfully therefore we are beginning to think that the safest course may be to work towards an interim settlement which would guarantee our sales over the next few years together with as tight as possible undertakings concerning the nature of the definitive settlement to be negotiated three years hence. When the Commission comes forward with its revised offers we shall of course endeavour to push them as far as possible in the direction of a definitive and permanent settlement which would be acceptable to us. Against the possibility however that this manoeuvre will not repeat not be successful we would be grateful for your comments on the sort of two phase scheme which emerged in our discussions with Mansholt.

TARIFF CONFERENCE — RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

In our reference telegram we indicated that EEC were expected to return to Geneva with revised offers on or shortly after January 4, and that presentation of these offers would, in effect, mark the opening of the real Article XXIV:6 renegotiations. At Monday's meeting of the Tariff Conference Donne (EEC Representative) indicated that he hoped to be able to present limited new offers next week, but that the Community's offer in respect of a number of important items would have to await decisions to be taken at January 31 meeting of the Council of Ministers. He indicated that, with the exception of certain special cases, the new offer would consist only of the binding of further items in the common tariff (Brussels Telegram 876 December 23).†

2. This statement by Donne provoked sharply critical comments from certain EFTA countries followed by lengthy statements from a representative group of Contracting Parties. Most effective intervention was by UK representative, who emphasized that what was required before a satisfactory settlement could be reached under Article XXIV:6 was a substantial reduction in Common European Tariff rates, and that for the Commission to devise offers of further bindings which could only delay still further the opening of the Dillon negotiations.

Further, the Community's claim to have maintained the previously existing balance of concessions with other countries in terms of trade statistics alone was largely irrelevant. Bindings were not repeat not interchangeable on the basis of purely statistical calculation: acceptable compensation had to be provided in the same sectors as those in which concessions were being withdrawn. This statement was strongly supported by Scandinavians, Austria, and Brazil and by ourselves. Our own intervention reiterated the points made in previous meetings of the Trade Conference concerning the need for EEC speedily to come forward with improved offers which would provide a realistic basis for negotiation in all sectors.

USA statement was unfortunately weak and rather equivocal, and was largely devoted to the difficulty in setting a date for the opening of the Dillon negotiations before the decisions of the Council of Ministers were known. Corse did not repeat not express any real disappointment at the nature of EEC's offers to date and referred to the problem of agriculture only in passing. Austrian and Czech delegates drew attention (as did we) to the legal problems created by the unilateral breaching of concessions by EEC in moving towards the Common European Tariff on January 1 and before satisfactory completion of renegotiations under Article XXIV:6. In view of the six month time limit on compensatory withdrawals under Article XXVIII:3(a), Austrian representative said he would be raising this question again at the next meeting of the Trade Conference.

3. Donne's reply was not repeat not forthcoming but, although he reiterated that EEC's offer was fair and reasonable, there were indications that he himself recognized that revised offers which he had so far been authorized to make were inadequate. He promised to report to his authorities the views expressed by various delegates. (We understand that Donne and his colleagues on the Six negotiating teams welcomed the forthright expression of Contracting Parties views at the Trade Conference since they confirm what the negotiators have been reporting to Brussels.)

4. It was agreed that the Trade Conference should meet again on February 6, with a view to deciding what date should be set for the opening of the Dillon negotiations. The general assumption seems to be that this date will be sometime in late March and possibly even later. You may wish to bear in mind the significance of this postponement with regard to our exchange of offer lists with UK (our telegram 4 of January 4).†

5. Since the Trade Conference meeting we have met informally with Donne to seek clarification of EEC position. It is clear that he already has authority to make some additional offers related to the priority list of requests attached to our aide mémoire of December [9]. Additional authority is being sought at meeting of Committee III in Paris next week. Committee III will also discuss nature of offer to be made on wheat but it seems clear EEC decisions on wheat and other particularly important products will have to await January 31 meeting of the Council of Ministers. We expect to meet with EEC negotiating team Thursday January 19 to receive their revised offers with respect to Canada. We doubt whether next week's offers will go beyond some additional bindings and possibly the offer to bind a few tariff quotas of interest to us.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — SPRING 1960

The NATO Secretariat has proposed dates for the meetings of experts charged with preparing the usual background papers for the spring Ministerial meeting, which is to be held in Istanbul from May 2 to 4. According to the tentative schedule, the meetings would be held in Paris on the following dates:

(a) Middle East	March 14 - 16
(b) Soviet Trends	March 16 - 18
(c) Eastern Europe	March 21 - 23
(d) Far East	March 23 - 25 or 28 - 31.

2. The Chairman of the Political Advisers' Committee intends also to propose the reconvening of the Committee on Africa and has raised the question of how the Africa studies might be integrated into the normal pattern of NATO political studies prepared for the Ministerial meetings.

3. A copy of the telegram under reference is attached. We are asked to inform the Delegation before the next meeting of the Political Advisers' Committee on Tuesday January 26 whether we intend to be represented at the meetings and, if so, whether the proposed dates are satisfactory. The views of the Divisions concerned are as follows.

4. European Division recommends participation in the meetings on Soviet trends and Eastern Europe and has, on January 19, sent a letter over your signature to Mr. Ford† asking if it would be possible for him to again represent the Department at those two meetings.

5. Middle Eastern Division has suggested that Mr. Beaulieu from Beirut attend the Middle East meeting. We understand that a memorandum of January 21 from Middle Eastern Division to Mr. Glazebrook, which sets out Middle Eastern Division's reasons for their recommendation, has been passed to you by Mr. Glazebrook.

6. Far Eastern Division has also recommended representation at the Far East Meeting. They pointed out that the personal contacts made in such a meeting would be of considerable value to their representative and to the Department in gaining a greater familiarity with the views of the other NATO countries on the problems we face in the Far East and also in the impetus such discussions give to taking a fresh look at these problems. Of equal importance is the fact that our participation would give us an opportunity to present the Canadian views on various aspects of Far Eastern affairs "on the ground level" when the first draft of the background paper is being prepared. On occasion there is considerable divergence between our views and those of other NATO countries on a particular problem and it is difficult for our Delegation to argue for and to achieve substantive amendments at a later stage. In this context difficulties were encountered in connection with the last Far Eastern paper prepared in NATO when we found ourselves in disagreement with almost the whole of the section devoted to the situation in Laos. These difficulties point up the fact that through our membership on the International Commissions for Indochina, Canada represents a particular point of view with respect to the Indochina states which, we think, could usefully be brought to the attention of other NATO members in preparing a balanced assessment of the situation in that particular area. Far Eastern Division has in mind Mr. T.M. Pope as our representative.

7. In the opinion of this Division, participation in all the meetings would be desirable for the reasons put forward by the other Divisions in making their specific recommendations. It would also provide tangible evidence of our proclaimed willingness to intensify the process of political consultation in NATO. If, however, priorities must be established, we would assume that participation in drafting the papers on Soviet trends and Eastern Europe would be of first importance, particularly because of the extent to which the NATO Ministerial meeting will be concerned with preparations for the Summit Conference. As the forthcoming meeting is to be held in Turkey, it is possible that Middle Eastern problems may receive increased attention, and second place should probably be given to the Middle East experts' meeting. Our particular concern with the Far East would no doubt make it useful to have an influence in the discussions on that subject. If participation could be arranged, it would provide balanced Canadian representation in preparations for the Ministerial meeting.

8. Pending word from Mr. Ford and Mr. Beaulieu, there would appear to be no comment to make at this stage on the proposed dates. If the dates are inconvenient for Mr. Ford and Mr. Beaulieu we would hope that it would be possible to change either the dates or the choice of representatives. The dates are set more in advance of the Ministerial meeting than usual, but this will probably be advantageous in that it will allow more time for consideration of papers by those concerned and for the mechanics of printing and distribution.

9. With regard to Africa, Commonwealth Division has discussed the NATO Secretariat's ideas with Mr. Glazebrook and their view is that, although we regard Africa as still a particularly delicate topic for NATO discussion and although we still have misgivings as to the value of the project in relation to the risks involved, we should offer no objection to reconvening the Africa Committee or to the addition of its studies to the other area studies normally undertaken in advance of the Ministerial meetings. Even if membership of the Committee on Africa were to be thrown open before the next Ministerial meeting, it is most unlikely that we would wish to send a representative.

10. If you agree, we shall inform the NATO Delegation that we hope to send experts to take part in all four of the scheduled meetings, but that we must reserve our position on dates until we have heard from the proposed representatives to the Soviet Trends and Eastern Europe, and the Middle East meetings.[1]

TRENDS AND IMPLICATIONS OF SOVIET POLICY

Following is preliminary report by Ford on NATO working group. Begins: As working papers USA and UK presented complete drafts and I submitted a draft for general section which I envisaged as key portion of paper. My paper was at first accepted as text on which to work but intense opposition at once developed led by French supported by Germans and Turks. We soon reached an impasse even after drafting by British of a rather unsatisfactory alternative and it was decided to proceed to consideration of rest of study.

2. After encouragement from Norwegian and Danish representatives, who said their governments shared our dissatisfaction with last years paper I drafted a new general section, this time for tactical reasons drawing heavily on Herter's speech to Council of last December.[2] Thus USA could hardly oppose it and British agreed in general, but opposition from French particularly remained adamant. A working group composed of French British and USA representatives and myself was therefore set up to try to reconcile views. French were absolutely determined to reject every phrase which might imply that Russians were interested in anything but short-range tactics. They did not repeat not want even to include obvious and innocuous statement that Khrushchev recognized that war was likely to endanger or destroy achievements of communism. USA also hedged and in these circumstances resulting compromise was not repeat not entirely satisfactory. However measure of distance we were able to come can be gauged by French representative's statement that he would have a very difficult time in Quai D'Orsay.

3. When revised version was submitted to Committee, French representative said he was still dissatisfied and German and Turkish representatives supported him in trying to water it down further. I said I could not repeat not recommend anything less to you; I had come a long way towards compromise and if there was to be any further change then perhaps we would have to resort to the unsatisfactory measure of submitting the two extreme views to PAC and I saw no repeat no reason why they could resolve what we were unable to do. British, Danish and Norwegian representatives supported this and report was accepted. French representative said however he thought Quai D'Orsay would be very unhappy and they would probably return to attack in PAC.

4. Paper is relatively short and to the point. It is obviously impossible with so many differing points of view to get a report entirely satisfactory to everyone. This one goes at least some way to meet our point of view but had to be a compromise unless we were to admit failure to present an agreed report. To have held out for our original thesis would have left us along with Norway and Denmark and made us rather unpopular.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 29, 1960

Dear Jules [Léger],

Robert Ford's report on the working group on Soviet policy (your telegram 802), together with the draft general section of the paper (telegram 803),† has revived our earlier doubts about the effectiveness of the present procedures in NATO for preparing analytical papers designed to express an agreed NATO appreciation of controversial political situations. It is my impression that during the last two years the preparation of papers on Soviet intentions has led to controversy between members of the Alliance and created doubts and perhaps suspicion without having an appreciable effect in coordinating individual views.

Last December the paper attributed all changes in Soviet policy to a shift in tactics, an interpretation which we cannot accept without qualification. Ford attended only the last of the three meetings of the working group and we were not therefore in a strong position to object. His report on the group's work, however, suggested that the United Kingdom and United States representatives had instructions to present a cautious estimate of Soviet intentions in order to allay French and West German suspicions as to the United Kingdom and United States attitude toward dealings with the USSR. It was notable that at the December ministerial meeting Herter's speech included a section on Soviet intentions which differed significantly from the paper submitted by the United States representative on the working group, and presented a point of view with which we are in general agreement. Speeches by other ministers reflected other assessments of Soviet intentions and demonstrated that the working group's paper was not regarded as an effective synthesis of NATO opinion.

Because of the strong and effective stand taken by Ford at the recent working group meeting, the draft prepared by the working group is closer to our own view. Ford's use of Herter's speech, as he pointed out in the telegram, made it difficult for the United States representative to oppose Ford's arguments but it is clear from his report that their acquiescence represents more a tactical defeat than a real change of view. However, I expect that the French and German delegations will continue their opposition in the Political Advisers Committee and that we may be pressed to accept further revisions.

I think it evident that the present requirement for a single agreed analysis results in a paper which:

(a) probably does not fully represent the opinion of any government in the Alliance;

(b) even in the process of preparation does not evoke an unqualified presentation of the views held by all member governments;

(c) is probably not used by any government as a guide in assessing Soviet intentions, although it may be used by governments or national representatives, in so far as they agree with it, to buttress their argument;

(d) omits disputed points altogether, covers them by some innocuous wording, or presents only the most cautious point of view; and

(e) does not appear to have brought about any real change in the private assessment of member governments.

I wonder if there is a possibility that members of the Council would agree to revise their conception of papers, such as the Soviet intentions paper, which involve an analysis of controversial questions. Rather than, as at present, insisting on an agreed paper on matters on which opinions are strongly divided, would it not be possible to attempt in future a paper which would recognize differences of approach where these exist and which would cover the range of opinion of member governments? I think it would be preferable not to identify government views by name, and merely to note the spread and balance of opinion.

I think a paper prepared along these lines would be more useful to ministers because it would reveal the range of opinions held by member governments. It should permit effective analysis of controversial issues and should stimulate a more genuine discussion at ministerial meetings. Such a paper should also be of greater value to the foreign ministries of the member governments. Finally, this approach might avoid some disputes which create disharmony among NATO members to no apparent purpose. I should make it clear that this conception would not be appropriate for action papers; and in the case of analytical papers, the desirable objective would of course be to identify as broad a measure of agreement as possible.

I should be interested in knowing whether you share this criticism of the present procedures and how you regard these suggestions for a revised procedure. Do you think that other members of the Alliance are dissatisfied with the present method? If so, how might we best proceed in putting forward our suggestion for a revised approach?

I am sending a copy of this letter to Robert Ford for his comments.

Yours sincerely,

N.A. ROBERTSON

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], March 31, 1960

PREPARATION OF NATO PAPER ON THE SITUATION IN THE FAR EAST

Attached for your information is a summary of the discussions in Paris last week leading to the preparation of a paper on the situation in the Far East for presentation to the NATO foreign ministers.

2. As you know, I have come back convinced of the value of Canadian participation in these half-yearly NATO exercises. The principal reasons for this are as set out below.

(1) Canadian participation is useful in countering approaches to and interpretations of the problems of the area which do not agree with our own. Although it is true that we could have accepted the U.K. draft without question, it is equally true that the views it contained would not have been accepted by the Committee without Canadian support both during the discussions and in the form of drafts prepared beforehand. The elements we have objected to in previous papers — e.g., excessive interpretation of the problems of the area in terms of communism vs anti-communism, overemphasis on military preparedness — seem to be acceptable to most members of the Committee and we cannot rely on the U.K. representative alone to have them moderated. Even when a particular interpretation is acceptable to some representatives, it is not certain that they will defend it. In the group preparing the paper on Soviet intentions, to take a recent example, Mr. Ford was forced to take the lead in all discussions and it is certain that without his participation the paper would have represented a total capitulation to Franco-German views. It might also be noted that in the opinion of the Secretariat, the Political Advisers Committee is not the place to suggest substantive amendments to a paper; if a country has views on a particular subject, it should arrange to have them presented in the committee preparing the relevant paper.

In short, therefore, if we were successful in having a more acceptable paper this year than in the past, it was in some measure at least due to the fact that Canadian drafts had been prepared and Canadian representation made it possible to give added support to the views with which we were in agreement.

(2) An advantage of considerable importance for officers of my rank is the experience gained and the opportunities afforded for making contacts with those specialized in Far Eastern affairs in other Ministries. The discussions were informative both in themselves and in that they provided insights into the national attitudes of the other representatives towards the problems of Asia. I personally found considerable training value in the opportunity to take part for the first time in this sort of committee work with officers from without the Canadian service.

(3) A point that was emphasized by Mr. Léger and Mr. George is that the NATO delegation welcomes Canadian participation in these meetings since it provides an expression of further Canadian interest in NATO and enhances our ability to make our views known and accepted in general. It is easier to be taken seriously in the Political Advisers Committee if we have shown an active interest in the various special committees.

3. Subject to your agreement, and on the basis of my experience in Paris last week, I would recommend:

(1) that Far Eastern Division (and other divisions which have a responsibility for the other subjects covered by these NATO papers) accept the principle of Canadian participation in the half-yearly meetings of "experts" to prepare papers for NATO ministerial meetings.

(2) that the Department should be represented from Ottawa at the desk-officer level at least once a year (except when the importance of the paper makes higher-level representation desirable), preferably at the autumn meetings which are considered to be of slightly more importance than the spring meetings. Since Departmental finances might not permit attendance from Ottawa at all meetings, officers in European posts with knowledge of the area concerned could be designated to attend meetings at which the Department will not be represented by an Ottawa-based officer. In all cases, draft papers should be prepared in Ottawa — the representative without a national draft is very much a second-class citizen. Finally, officers designated should have a sufficient knowledge of French to understand the interventions in that language.

NOTE ON NATO FAR EAST EXPERTS' MEETING

What follows is designed to give an account of the preparation last week in Paris of this spring's NATO paper on the situation in the Far East. The meetings were attended by representatives of the U.K., U.S., France, Italy, Germany, The Netherlands, Belgium and Canada.

2. We had prepared in the Division five draft country-sections for submission to the meeting. These drafts covered China, Laos, Cambodia, Burma and Indonesia. When I saw Mr. George in his office on Monday afternoon, he made the point that the most important section of NATO papers was the introduction, and that it was important to submit one if we attached importance to having any of our ideas accepted. I therefore got down to drafting such an introductory section, drawing fairly heavily on the conclusions of the paper prepared in the Departmental Working Group on Sino-Soviet policy, adding a paragraph on Chinese economic development at the beginning as well as a paragraph summarizing the situation in the other countries of Asia at the end. The sense of the draft section was to note:

(a) the redressment of the economic situation in China;

(b) the continued useful effects of Chinese mishandling of foreign relations in the past year and more;

(c) the inability of the other nations of Asia to match their growing awareness of the Chinese danger with corresponding efforts to improve prospects for political stability, economic development and regional co-operation.

3. This draft was reproduced in time for distribution to the committee at its first meeting on Wednesday morning.

4. The first meeting began with a rather inconducive and formless discussion of the major changes in the area since the last paper had been produced in November. The only identifiable point of agreement was that the Chinese seemed to be reverting to subtler tactics and that this was dangerous.

5. The committee met again after lunch to discuss the first country study on China. Apart from our drafts, three other delegations had prepared papers — the U.K., the United States and France. The Chairman — a German on the NATO Secretariat — immediately showed a disposition to overlook the French and Canadian drafts. Since I had a proprietary interest in the latter, I thought it prudent to suggest that the French draft presented a novel approach and should be considered as well. In fact, its only peculiarity was that it ignored the economic situation, but the diversion created such confusion that when the smoke finally cleared we were taking the Canadian draft as the basis for our discussion. After considerable argument about the relative success or failure of Chinese internal policies over the past six months, we agreed on four paragraphs which were based on the U.K. and Canadian papers.

6. The Canadian draft was less successful in the Chinese foreign policy section, and the U.K. draft, which was taken as the basis, was in fact a better account, and did not run counter to any of our views. There seemed to be good hope of having our views accepted on Sino-Soviet relations when the Italian — who had a genius for bringing up objections when a passage had been virtually agreed upon — began to doubt whether we should be too categorical about noting differences between the Soviet Union and China. At this the Netherlands Representative suddenly shot to life and, both guns blazing, informed the committee that China had publicly supported Soviet disarmament proposals and had welcomed Mr. Khrushchev's trip to Asia. There was no evidence, therefore, for saying that there were any differences between the two countries. Rather shaken by the force of this attack, I thought the best tactic was to keep silent and let the others make the running. Unfortunately, the American seemed to be under instructions to say nothing on this point while of the two French representatives one was deaf and the other sound asleep both as a result of the lunch that the Secretariat had offered us and because, as a gentleman jockey, he had been up since 5 in the morning to exercise his horse at Maisons-Lafitte. This was particularly annoying since I had been banking heavily on him to help us out should this section run into difficulties. The U.K. Representative and myself were therefore left to defend the thesis that differences did exist the Soviet Union and China. Unfortunately, the U.K. Representative began by citing Kang Sheng's speech before the Warsaw Pact meeting in February.[3] This was apparently a sensitive point for the Chairman, since Mr. Spaak had noted this speech and had drawn unwarranted conclusions from it. The Secretariat had since then been at pains to assure Mr. Spaak that the Sino-Soviet alliance was not on the point of crumbling. The very mention of Kang Sheng was therefore sufficient to put the Chairman against us and the only way to save the situation was to accept the establishment of a two-man drafting sub-committee to produce an agreed position. I thus found myself closeted with the Netherlands Representative early next morning when three paragraphs were produced. Although these paragraphs were successful in avoiding blatant internal contradictions, they were not particularly satisfactory.

7. This should have brought to an end the discussions on China which, together with the general discussion at the first meeting, had taken up nearly half the time allotted to the preparation of the paper and gave rise to the most detailed drafting and exchanges of views. Unfortunately there later appeared at the meeting on Friday morning a representative of the Economic Secretariat who expressed dissatisfaction with the first paragraph of our draft. Since this paragraph was a Canadian contribution, I immediately said (1) that I doubted whether the Economic Secretariat knew more about the situation than we did and, (2) that the experts had been called together to prepare independently a report for their Ministers and were therefore not bound to accept outside advice. Although the principle in (2) was no doubt sound, this intervention was not a particularly happy one, since the Economic Secretariat's point — that we had not given the Chinese sufficient credit for their success in overcoming the economic problems of early 1959 — was perfectly acceptable to us. There then followed a rather embarrassed discussion in which, with the help of the U.K. Representative, means were found to reject the Economic Secretariat's draft while retaining the substance. We finally found a sentence in the U.K.'s original draft and composed a sentence or two of our own which covered the point. In the process, of course, Canada lost a paragraph.

8. In spite of this, it seemed to me that we had been fairly successful in having our China draft considered by the Committee. It was nevertheless nothing compared to the success the drafts prepared by Mrs. Beattie and Mr. Sharpe encountered. In all cases they were taken as the basis of discussion, and in two cases were adopted virtually in their entirety. The only unsatisfactory feature of the discussions on countries other than China was lack of time for detailed discussion. We passed to examinations of these countries on Thursday afternoon, and finished them — with the exception of India — on the same day in order to leave the next day free for a discussion of the general section and redrafting of the paper as a whole. The points that emerged in the discussion that are worth mentioning are:

1. Great emphasis was put on the significance of the Revised U.S.-Japan Security Treaty[4] as demonstrating the close alignment of Japan to the West. I was almost totally unsuccessful in having inserted a word of warning to the effect that neutralism was a strong force in Japan and could compromise both Mr. Kishi and his policies.

2. There was general agreement that we should blast President Rhee for his cavalier treatment of the opposition in the recent election.[5] The U.S. Representative accepted without difficulty a French draft which covered this point.

3. The Dutch Representative insisted that the Canadian draft on Indonesia be amended so as to give more emphasis to the strength of the Communists and the continuing ability of the rebels to tie down the army. It was nevertheless surprising that he accepted our draft in general with such equanimity, and did not insist on value judgments against the Sukarno Government.

4. The French draft on Laos contained a paragraph which described the United Nations' role in Laos as a positive contribution to stability in the country, in contrast to our draft which was more factual in its treatment of this point. Rather surprisingly; the U.S. Representative agreed to the adoption of the French text.

5. The German Representative produced a draft on India which did not appear to violate substantially the instructions from Ottawa not to delve too deeply into internal Indian affairs. Although I tried to suggest we might be better off if we ignored India completely, the U.K. Representative's instructions were to say nothing on this subject and I was steamrolled. I therefore said that I had received no briefing on India, and that I would sit through the discussions only on condition that it was understood that the Canadian delegate in the Political Advisers Committee might reopen the question when Ottawa had seen the draft. The Chairman took note of this reservation, but also said that the Political Advisers Committee had already agreed that this year's Far East Paper should include an Indian section.

9. Not much need be said about the preparation of the general section of the paper. Our draft was again fairly successful. The result was a fairly comprehensive review of main developments in the area without too much emphasis on military preparation as the solution to all problems.

coordinate Western views on the general subject of East-West relations. This material is for the use of the Western Heads of Government at the Summit Meeting. The report of the Working Group is to be given a final review at the Ministerial Meeting in Istanbul.

East-West relations comprise a wide range of subjects and the Working Group's report is therefore extremely diffuse. It includes:

a review of cultural, scientific, technological and other exchanges with the Soviet Union; possible Soviet proposals and Western answers on general political relations; and aspects of East-West relations including an examination of the advantages and disadvantages of a three-power or four-power statement concerning a "code for co-existence."

It also includes sections on trade and economic questions and an examination of the possibilities for East-West co-operation in the field of aid to under-developed countries. Separate briefing papers have been prepared on these two latter subjects.

Approach to the Soviet Union at the Summit Meeting

In discussion of the Working Group paper which has already taken place in the NATO Council, it is apparent that there continue to be differences of opinion over the extent to which the Western Heads of Government should express dissatisfaction over the present state of relations between the Soviet bloc and the West. French and German representatives have taken the lead in urging that the Western side should complain strongly to Premier Khrushchev that the present state of international relations remains unsatisfactory. Other representatives, including Mr. Léger, have suggested that, no matter how dissatisfied we may be with the present state of East-West relations, there has been a significant improvement since Stalin's death — first: the risk of war has been somewhat reduced, and secondly (as has been recognized in Annex A of the Working Group's paper) substantial progress has been made on some aspects of East-West contacts since the 1955 Heads of Government meeting.

This more positive approach which Canada among others has promoted assumes that further improvement in relations between the West and the USSR requires a fundamental change in the attitude of the Soviet leaders towards the West. For over forty years they have believed that the West was hostile to them and have confirmed their impression by acting in a hostile manner towards the West. Now, confronted with the possibility of a nuclear war in which great destruction would be wreaked upon the Soviet Union, the Soviet leaders appear to have decided to reduce the dangers of accidental war. But their basic hostility to the West remains a serious impediment to any rapid improvement in relations. The most that can be hoped for is a continuation of the present rate of progress. This, it would seem, could be best achieved by aiming at all times in discussions and negotiations at the Summit Conference to secure the maximum area of agreement with the Soviet Union on projects and policies which would serve to increase contact. (Attached as Annex I is a suggested statement for possible use as a general comment on the report.)†

Code of Co-existence

Although the Working Group has included some background material on the advantages and disadvantages of attempting either a three-power or a four-power statement on a code of behaviour during a period of co-existence, there has been disagreement between the member governments on the advisability of such an approach. The British Government favours four-power agreement to a set of principles which would involve Soviet recognition that peaceful co-existence means something more than the mere continuation of the struggle between the East and the West by every means short of war. The French Government is interested in exploring the possibilities of four-power agreement to a statement in support of non-intervention by the great powers in the internal affairs of other countries.

The question was apparently discussed at the Washington meeting by the four foreign ministers concerned. They failed to reach agreement and it was decided to leave this question until the Heads of Government meetings immediately prior to the Summit Conference itself.[6] For this reason the question is unlikely to come up at the Istanbul meeting.

As far as the Canadian Government is concerned the principal emphasis has been placed on the desirability that the communiqué at the conclusion of the Summit Conference should note a decision — if a decision is reached — that future Summit Conferences should be held. This is in fact the essential question since, if it is agreed to hold further Summit Conferences, it can probably be assumed that Soviet international conduct will continue to be somewhat more moderate. (In case the subject should be discussed, I attach as Annex II a suggested statement which you might wish to use.)†

CONFIDENTIAL [April 1960]

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — MAY 1960
GERMANY AND BERLIN

The four-power Working Group on Germany and Berlin, established in conformity with decisions of the December Ministerial Meeting, conducted its work in Washington and produced an agreed report containing recommendations relating to the Western approach at the Summit to problems in this field. Their report was reviewed by the foreign ministers of the United States, United Kingdom, France and West Germany in Washington, on April 14, and was approved, subject to minor changes. This report will be discussed at the Istanbul meeting, when Mr. Lloyd will make an oral presentation relating to it. It will subsequently be reviewed by the Western Heads of Government when they meet in Paris just prior to the Summit Meeting.

Comment: In general this report is thorough and well-prepared. It sets forth with clarity and completeness an analysis of Soviet intentions and it examines in detail the contrasting positions of East and West on the German and Berlin issues. There are points of detail on which Canada might appropriately comment but on the whole the presentation of the problems and possibilities involved in the German and Berlin questions is one which we can endorse.

Soviet Policy Toward Germany and Berlin

The paper begins by pointing out that "such relaxation of tension as has occurred" has not involved any substantive change in the Soviet position. The Soviet leaders appear to assume that world power is shifting in their direction and that the West will be obliged to accommodate to this shift.

Their long-term objectives with respect to Germany are the incorporation of Berlin in the Soviet Zone, the consolidation of the present régime in East Germany and the extension of communist influence throughout Germany. For the present, however, the Soviet leaders are expected to concentrate on undermining the Western position in Berlin, severing Berlin's ties with West Germany and forcing the West into dealing with the East German régime. They are not expected to use force in the immediate future to achieve these objectives, but will promote them by their control of the routes of access and their ability to bring about crises when they wish. In order to avoid upsetting the improved East-West relations, they are seeking to place responsibility for the situation in Berlin on West Germany.

The paper recognizes that Khrushchev is under some pressure from the leaders of East Germany to make progress over Berlin. However, he has a personal stake in the continuation of détente and is not expected to press at the Summit Meeting for a solution to Berlin. If there should be no progress, the paper states that sooner or later Khrushchev will proceed with his threat to sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany, although the timing of this action will depend on the world situation.

On Germany Khrushchev is expected to concentrate on the existing Soviet proposals for a peace treaty with the two Germanies.[7] On Berlin, Khrushchev is expected to press for the withdrawal of Western forces, the severing of political and economic links with the Federal Republic and increasing the status of the Soviet Zone régime.

Comment: We agree generally with this estimate of Soviet intentions on Germany and Berlin. It seems probable that for the immediate future Khrushchev may agree not to insist on a settlement of Berlin, although this will probably be dependent upon some success being achieved in the fields of disarmament and increasing East-West contacts. As the paper recognizes, Khrushchev will not indefinitely hold up applying his threat to sign a peace treaty with East Germany.

We regard to the long-term aims, while we agree with the description, it is worth noting that such statements are not in themselves very revealing. The Western long-term aims in Germany are in fact the reverse, namely, the reunification of Germany, and the linking of the whole of Germany to the NATO Alliance.

Western Response on Germany

The paper starts from the position that the present division of Germany into two parts creates tension and endangers peace. Reunification would at the same time provide a solution of the German problem and of the Berlin question.

The paper recognizes that reunification is not possible at present since the Soviet Union is unwilling to relinquish its control of East Germany. The object of Western policy, therefore, is to keep alive the desire for reunification. To do this the Western side at the Heads of Government meeting will first revive the Western peace plan which was originally submitted to the Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers in 1959.[8] The only modification is provision for adjusting the security aspects of the plan to take account of any agreement reached by the 10-nation disarmament committee. If this proposal is rejected, as is anticipated, the Western side will propose that a plebiscite be held in East Germany, West Germany and Berlin, to be supervised by the United Nations in order to determine whether the German people wish a reunified Germany or separate peace treaties with the two parts of Germany. It is assumed that the Soviet Union will not accept this proposal either. (A draft of the proposal is attached to the Working Group paper.)

The paper recommends that the Western Heads of Government should reject Soviet proposals for peace treaties with the two parts of Germany and any suggestions for the formation of an all-German committee leading to confederation between the two parts of Germany.

Comment: The paper recognizes correctly that there is no possibility for reunification in the present circumstances. This, however, is a private position and in public the Western Heads of Government continue to urge reunification. It is important to note the difference between the private and public positions which the Heads of Government will adopt.

It is not expected that the Soviet Government will agree to the proposal for a plebiscite. Its purpose is to emphasize Western support for reunification and to attract favourable world publicity. It should be noted that the proposal includes a provision that in the event that there were "differing results in the three areas ... (the Western side) would be prepared to accept as a basis for further discussion of the German question the choice expressed by a majority of the German people as a whole." This would provide the possibility for the West German population, which is three times the size of that of East Germany, to cancel out even a favourable vote in East Germany for the Soviet plan. This will ensure Soviet rejection of the proposal.

The paper recognizes that it is impossible to avoid separate discussion of Berlin at the Summit Meeting and suggests that the Berlin question should be properly set in the German context.

Western Response on Berlin

The paper concludes that the Western powers cannot expect any improvement on their present position in Berlin. It examines a number of possible solutions which have been suggested on Berlin:

(a) a proposal to incorporate Berlin into the Federal Republic as an eleventh land;

(b) a proposal to put Berlin under the authority and protection of the United Nations;

(c) a proposal to establish a sovereign "free city" of Berlin in which Allied troops would remain as a security force;

(d) (it rejects as completely undesirable the Soviet proposal for a demilitarized "free city.")

The paper concludes that "the serious disadvantages of any of these arrangements would greatly outweigh any possible advantages which such proposals might involve." The disadvantages which it states without elaboration are as follows:

(a) "they would abolish the last vestiges of common responsibility for Germany among the four powers;

(b) "they would reduce to a precarious state any continued presence of Allied forces in Berlin;

(c) "they would render definitive the division of Berlin into two parts;

(d) "they would make it still more difficult to avoid dealing with East Germany;

(e) "they would gravely affect, if not nullify, the NATO guarantee for Berlin."

The paper examines the proposals made by the Western powers at the Geneva Conference in 1959 for such steps as reducing Allied troop strength, renouncing nuclear weapons, and restricting "certain activities," and raises doubt about the advisability of renewing these proposals, if they were related to a "time clause."

There is a brief reference to the possibility that the Western powers may "put forward a proposal for an all-Berlin solution." No indication is given as to what the Working Group has in mind, beyond stating that it is working on an elaboration of proposals tabled by Secretary Herter at Geneva on May 26, 1959.

In the event that new Soviet proposals should be advanced, the paper suggests that they be evaluated in the light of the following requirements:

1. maintenance of Allied occupation rights;
2. adequate guarantees of West Berlin security;
3. avoidance of obstructions to reunification;
4. maintenance of the ties between Berlin and the Federal Republic;
5. avoidance of the erosion of the principle of unity of Berlin;
6. maintenance of the freedom of access to Berlin;
7. continuation of constitutional government in West Berlin; and
8. acceptability to the West Berlin people.

The paper emphasizes that the problem of Berlin is only one aspect of the problem of Germany and warns that any proposals on Berlin should be examined with regard to their effect on the German problem.

Comment: The paper has no positive suggestions to make with regard to Berlin and treats with extreme caution those proposals already made by the Western side at the Geneva Conference in 1959. It is implied, although not stated, that discussion of the German question will lead to discussion of Berlin; it is further implied that although the West will begin from the position it took at the beginning of the Foreign Ministers' Conference, it will almost certainly be necessary to consider again the ideas put forward by the West in 1959 for improving the situation in Berlin.

The problem which arose at the Geneva Conference and to which no adequate solution has been found since then is the situation which would face the West at the conclusion of a time limit. The Russians were unwilling to affirm that, if no agreement had been reached by the end of an agreed time limit, Western rights in Berlin would be unimpaired. It is unlikely that the Soviet Union would be prepared to agree to a time limit which would be anywhere near acceptable to the West. In this circumstance it seems unlikely, even if the Western proposals should again be discussed, that a separate settlement on Berlin could be reached.

We agree with the estimate in the paper that Khrushchev is unlikely to press at this first Summit Meeting for a settlement on Berlin. This will depend, however, on progress in the fields of disarmament and East-West relations.

As you know, President de Gaulle considered it important that these two subjects should be dealt with at the Summit Meeting since there was some prospect of agreement on them, whereas he saw no possibility of agreement on Berlin or Germany.

We agree that the West cannot expect to improve its position in Berlin. We also agree that the Soviet Union is unlikely, if it should prove impossible to reach an agreement over Berlin at this conference, to proceed immediately with its threat to sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany. In this circumstance, and assuming that some progress can be achieved in the fields of disarmament and East-West relations, the policy suggested in this paper is probably the best which the West can adopt for the present.

DISARMAMENT

The five Ministers principally concerned with Summit preparations on the disarmament question will meet in the British Consulate at 5.00 p.m. on Sunday, May 1. Their private discussions are expected to focus on a report which the Western negotiators will submit from Geneva on about April 26[9] and which should contain an indication of areas of possible agreement with the Soviet side for emphasis in the Western Summit position. Although the negotiators may well fail, as they did for the Washington meeting, to come up with positive suggestions, the report should provide a useful summary of the latest developments in Geneva on which to gauge likely Soviet tactics at the Summit meeting. Until it is available, it is difficult to pin-point specific issues which will hold the centre of the stage at the private meeting.

At the immediately following NATO meeting, disarmament will be the first item on the agenda and will be introduced by Mr. Selwyn Lloyd. The United Kingdom, the United States and Italy will no doubt work for an agreed Five Power presentation to NATO. France will be reluctant to lose freedom of manoeuvre in respect of General de Gaulle's special position on nuclear arms, but this should not be of as great importance to France as maintaining a common front with its two Western Summit colleagues.

Post NATO Meeting of Five Ministers

During the Washington meeting[10] the Italian representative, with the obvious blessing of Mr. Herter, suggested it would be desirable to have a further private meeting of the five Ministers after the NATO meeting. This would preserve maximum secrecy about the plans of the Western Heads of Government until the most propitious moment for them to announce their agreed initiatives. Since Canada has been one of the chief proponents of the principle of full and equal discussion in NATO, it would seem appropriate for us to go along with this suggestion, only if the NATO Council is informed about it.

Disarmament in East-West Relations

So far as Canada is concerned, disarmament should be considered in two separate, but obviously related, contexts at Istanbul. On the one hand, there is the general question of East-West relations; European Division has prepared a brief† emphasizing our interest in ensuring that the Western Heads of Government do not, either by intent or through neglect, fail to reflect our main views on disarmament in any declaration of Western principles on the proper conduct of East-West relations. The basic elements of Canadian policy relevant to this context are:

(a) emphasis on the independent importance of the disarmament negotiations;

(b) adequate recognition of the role of the United Nations;

[10] Voir/See Foreign Relations of the United States 1958-1960, Volume III (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1996), document 252.

(c) the need for early attention to nuclear disarmament, and

(d) willingness to negotiate seriously with, and to consider the reasonable preoccupations of, the Soviet side.

On the other hand, disarmament will be considered at Istanbul somewhat more thoroughly in the context of a possible Summit directive to the Ten Nation Committee. Without a spur to action from the four Heads of Government, negotiations in the Committee may well remain stalled. Canada is interested both in getting them moving as soon as possible and in having our policy preoccupations clearly reflected in any move taken for this purpose.

Nuclear Weapons Test Ban

Whether or not the Ten Nation Committee can get down to meaningful negotiations will depend on Soviet intentions, since their co-operation is essential if the discussions are to assume a concrete form. Ultimately, Soviet willingness to negotiate seriously, and indeed the willingness of the United Kingdom and the United States to continue their sincere efforts in the Committee, will hinge very directly on the success or failure of the Three Power talks on the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests. Although hope for an early agreement remains high, recent testimony in Washington has raised doubt that any treaty could be fully completed this summer, especially in an election year in the United States. It is, therefore, difficult to see a dramatic breakthrough in the Ten Nation Committee in the very immediate future.

Directive to the Ten Nation Committee

Nevertheless, there is much practical work that could be done in the Ten Nation Committee and our allies seem genuinely anxious to get on with it. Khrushchev, too, may wish to earn credit for helping the Ten Nation Committee over the present impasse if only because there may not be much progress on other political problems at the Summit. Moreover, the USSR is thought to have more genuine interest in disarmament now than at any time since the end of the war. Then, too, the Soviet Union has its eye very much on the next General Assembly of the United Nations.

The Western negotiators have already offered for concrete discussion, individually and together, virtually every one of the several disarmament measures contained in the first two stages of the Western plan.[11] Thus, even if the Western negotiators can suggest measures encouraging some degree of common East-West interest, it does not seem promising merely to advance these at the Summit. If anything can get the negotiations moving this summer, something more than is contained in the Western plan is required. Khrushchev may be expected to put forward his own proposals. The task may be to arrive in the Summit discussions at an accommodation, probably on fairly modest lines.

[11] Voir/See United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmnd. 981, Text of the plan for comprehensive disarmament tabled by the delegations of Canada, France, Italy, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America at the Conference of the Ten Nations Committee on Disarmament in Geneva on March 16, 1960, together with an Extract from a Speech by the Foreign Secretary at the United Nations on September 17, 1959 (London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1960).

Pledge Not to be the First to Use Weapons of Mass Destruction

A separate brief suggests that we should encourage our Western partners to explore variants of Zorin's "pledge"[12] (although it can hardly be said historically to be Soviet in origin). Our main suggestion is twofold:

(a) to use the phrase "weapons of mass destruction" in order to avoid the military danger of including tactical weapons and, at the same time, to encompass biological and chemical weapons, and

(b) to link the "pledge" to agreement to control effectively both a reduction of forces to the level of 2.5 million and a corresponding reduction in armaments.

General Norstad's Proposals

A separate brief† deals with the growing desire of SACEUR to have his proposals to reduce the threat of surprise attack in Europe figure in the Summit discussions. The military significance of these is not as great now as when they were first proposed. In addition, there is the danger that the USSR would seek to derive propaganda advantage from labelling the proposals as yet another Western attempt to avoid discussion of "real" disarmament. Nonetheless, since General Norstad's ideas relate to an area which the USSR describes as a potential tinderbox for war, they might strike a responsive chord with Khrushchev. If accepted, the SACEUR scheme would have the great political advantage of:

(a) establishing a pilot model for control and inspection in Europe,

(b) of compiling accurate information on existing forces in Europe as an indispensable first step toward eventual disarmament in that area, and

(c) giving both sides an opportunity to gain experience in co-operating together on a relatively small project.

Neither Norstad's proposals nor a qualified pledge regarding first use of weapons of mass destruction goes beyond first stage measures, if indeed they can be classed at all as disarmament. However, both could be significant exercises in confidence-building and, as such, could have an important effect in encouraging concrete discussion on other disarmament measures.[13]

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — ISTANBUL
REPORT OF DELEGATION ON ITEM I(B) — GERMANY AND BERLIN

A short and rather uninspired discussion followed Mr. Herter's brief oral review of the report of the Working Group, during which he took into account the views expressed at the meeting on May 1 of the Foreign Ministers of France, the UK, the USA and the Federal Republic. The debate revealed virtually unanimous support for the general line of approach set forth in the Working Group's report and the few opinions expressed were mainly designed to improve the presentational aspect of the Western position.

2. Following is a summary of the main points covered in the discussion.

Western Tactics

It was generally agreed that the Western negotiating powers will have to devise their tactics at the Summit as the actual Soviet position emerges in the course of the negotiations. Mr. Herter explained that the experience at the Geneva Foreign Ministers Conference last summer[14] had shown how difficult it was to anticipate the precise points of Soviet emphasis and to formulate the best Western response.

Plebiscite in Germany and Berlin

The Netherlands and Belgian Foreign Ministers stressed the need to implement the Working Group's suggestion for a plebiscite in both parts of Germany and Berlin as a counter to Soviet efforts to gain acceptance of their expected proposal to have separate peace treaties with the two parts of Germany. Mr. Segni (Italy) agreed with this line and recalled that a similar suggestion was made by the Italian government in May 1958 and repeated by the President of Italy on the occasion of his recent visit to Moscow. Mr. Krag (Denmark) thought that the West should exercise caution in exploring plebiscites in international affairs and he reminded the Council how they had been misused in the past. No comment was made by Mr. Brentano (Germany) whose brief and moderate intervention added nothing new to the known German position.

Summing up the discussion Mr. Herter expressed satisfaction that there seemed to be substantial agreement on proposing a plebiscite at the Summit to counter the expected Soviet opening move of a separate peace treaty with the two Germanies. He described it as a logical move and one that would come closer to finding an answer to a very difficult question.

[14] Voir/See Documents on International Affairs 1959 (London: Oxford University Press/Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1963), pp. 34-84.

Although no one had any illusions about the likelihood of its being accepted, if the USSR should agree, it would be "the sanest way of making reasonable determination leading towards the reunification of Germany."

Four-Power Committee of Experts

Mr. Krag (Denmark) thought that although the question of reunification was hardly negotiable now or in the immediate future, it would be desirable to devise ways and means of keeping the problem alive. In the circumstances he wondered whether it might be feasible to consider setting up a Four-Power Experts Committee supplemented by representatives from East and West Germany and entrusted with the task of continuing on a technical level the study of all aspects of the German problem with a view to preparing for new talks between governments. Mr. Herter commented that the experience of the last Summit Meeting was that fine words were agreed to but when the meetings were over and meetings of experts were convened, it was discovered that virtually nothing had been agreed to and that there had been a complete misunderstanding. He indicated that Mr. Krag's suggestion was being considered but that it was mainly one of determining at what level further negotiations should be held. This could be worked out if and when it becomes evident that further discussions would likely be fruitful.

Berlin — Status of Western Forces

Mr. Wigny (Belgium) suggested that it might be prudent if the West were not repeat not to place sole reliance on the present legal basis of their occupation forces in Berlin. Although their presence in Berlin is essential he thought that more flexibility would result if the West were to go to the Summit with a proposal that the Western military presence in Berlin be based on a new agreement the conclusion of which would depend on the insertion of a condition recognizing their presence. In reply Mr. Herter indicated that considerable thought had been given to devising such a formula but so far they had not repeat not succeeded. He pointed out that the present occupation rights are specifically defined and the occupying powers would not repeat not wish to give them up unless a better formula could be found, which was unlikely in the short time remaining before the Summit Meeting.

Berlin — Contingency Planning

Noting the absence of any reference to this problem in the report of the Working Group, Mr. Wigny enquired whether the plans made a year ago were still valid in the event the USSR should go ahead with its announced intention to sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany thereby giving the East Germans authority over the routes of access to Berlin. Mr. Herter confirmed that the earlier plans were still in effect.

NATO Support for Western Position

In presenting the views of the three, Mr. Herter emphasized how important the display of firmness and unity in previous NATO discussions of Germany and Berlin had been in creating a proper psychological and political climate for Western negotiations with the USSR. As expected, suggestions were made during the discussion that the Council publicly endorse the Western position in terms similar to previous NATO communiqués. In the event the final communiqué adopted on May 4[15] contained an unexceptionable paragraph which reaffirmed the Western view on German reunification, recalled the Council resolution of December 16,

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — ISTANBUL
REPORT OF DELEGATION ON ITEM I(C) — EAST-WEST RELATIONS

Following is a summary of the main observations and conclusions reached during a wide ranging and rather diffuse discussion of the Working Group's report, which was presented by M. Couve de Murville. Debate revealed general accord on major issues.

Approach to the Summit

2. It was agreed that Heads of Government could usefully exchange views at the Summit on the nature of East-West relations in an attempt to define the bases on which these relations should rest. There was considerable support for Mr. Lloyd's contention that one should not attempt to be too dogmatic or precise in approaching the general problem. The West should be positive and constructive in its approach but it was equally important that it should not be dominated by an attitude of inferiority.

Détente

3. M. Couve de Murville endorsed Mr. Lloyd's contention that there was no reason to believe that détente is a priori dangerous for the West and favourable to the Soviet Union. He added that the French government had always maintained that the first objective of the Summit was to arrive at a détente in international relations. France and other Western nations had, he thought, nothing to gain from prolongation of the cold war. Most speakers supported this line. Couve also contended that if the West adopts this attitude it will be in a better position to discuss specific problems at the Summit. For example, if the Soviet Union decides to raise the question of Berlin as a separate issue, when it is obviously part of the German problem as a while, and insists on acceptance of their solution, such an attitude would be contrary to the spirit of true détente and would enable the West to argue effectively that the Soviet Union is obviously not in favour of a real détente.

4. As a result of a long Greek intervention protesting against the Soviet Union's propaganda attacks against the Greek government at a time when the former is preaching co-existence and abandonment of the cold war, coupled with a similar complaint by the German Foreign Minister about Soviet propaganda attacks against the West German government, it was agreed that the West should insist that real détente must be general in application. The ministers also felt that although there was probably good reason to conclude that the Soviet Union genuinely wanted a détente in Europe, there was no indication that they would favour a détente in Africa, Asia, and possibly Latin America. In the circumstances the West should press for a détente covering other areas as well. This view was recorded in the communiqué which included the slogan "détente like peace is indivisible."

5. It was accepted that the West should have no illusions about the Summit Conference and should not lead public opinion to expect dramatic results or solutions. If some agreement on the nature of relations between East and West were reached it would be the beginning of a long and probably slow process which the West should try to influence in the right direction i.e. of a general détente.

Declaration of Principles

6. Canada and several other countries supported the idea that the three should have available at the Summit a declaration of principles, based on the Working Group's draft. This could be used to counter an expected Soviet move to gain acceptance of its formula of peaceful co-existence and could serve as an effective public statement of Western aims and objectives. It was not felt, however, that any advantage would be gained from attempting to reach a joint declaration of principles with the U.S.S.R., not only because of the difficulties involved in attaining such agreement but also because the Soviet Union would undoubtedly place its own interpretation on any agreed set of principles.

7. One question was whether the three should issue such a declaration before or after the Summit Meeting. Mr. Green expressed the view, which was accepted, that it should be left to the discretion of the three to decide in the light of developments. An enquiry by Mr. Spaak regarding NATO's role led to a suggestion from Mr. Herter that the declaration might be worked over and issued by NATO on the eve of the Summit Meeting. This idea was immediately supported by Mr. Lloyd, but M. Couve de Murville reserved his government's position asking that opportunity be given to study it. Mr. Lange made the interesting suggestion that in preparing the draft declaration an attempt might be made to bring the existing draft more into line with the principles of the United Nations Charter in order to gain wider international support.

Contacts and Cultural Exchanges

8. The consensus of opinion was than an increase in cultural and other exchanges with the Soviet bloc would be advantageous to the West. The Soviet Union would probably continue to be reticent about exchanging information and ideas fully but the West should persist in its efforts to persuade the Soviet Union to increase the flow of information and to widen contacts.

Trade and Economic Questions

9. Very little reference was made to the question of discussing East-West trade matters at the Summit. The Canadian and Belgian foreign ministers were pretty well the only speakers who dealt with this important aspect of East-West relations. The majority appeared content with the rather negative line taken in the Working Group's report and with M. Couve de Murville and Mr. Spaak's general observation that the West is in a much better position to take the initiative in respect of contacts and cultural exchanges than in the field of East-West trade. An even more negative opinion was expressed by M. Zorlu who warned that expanded Western trade with the Soviet Union in a period of détente will assist the latter in achieving its economic objectives at home and if Western credits are extended may enable it to help under-developed areas — thereby increasing its influence in those countries. There was, however, no disagreement with the Canadian view that the West should be prepared to engage in general discussions on East-West trade at the Summit if the other side should raise it.

10. By way of stressing the need for a positive Western approach at the Summit, Mr. Wigny thought that some Western initiatives on economic questions could be advantageous. As examples, he suggested (1) raising in a general way the possibility of Soviet participation in international commodity agreements and (2) exchanging views in broad terms on the problem of devising regulations to facilitate a more normal mutually satisfactory trading relationship between free enterprise economies and the controlled economies such as those of the Soviet bloc. Mr. Wigny referred to the considerable changes taking place in the Soviet economic system and expressed the opinion that the Russians appear to be setting up procedures which suggest they are contemplating some multilateral and triangular trading relationships.

11. A similar point of view in respect of commodity agreements was expressed by Mr. Green who referred also to the benefit which might accrue to under-developed countries in the event the Soviet Union should accept a Western proposal to participate in such arrangements. Soviet rejection of such a proposal would in the Canadian view undermine their position in under-developed countries, whose economies are highly sensitive to rapid fluctuations in the world prices of raw materials, and would give the West an important propaganda advantage.

Aid to Under-developed Areas

12. The majority showed little support for the idea, originally advanced by the French, that the West should take the initiative in proposing at the Summit that the U.S.S.R. should cooperate with the Western countries in an expanded international programme of aid to under-developed areas. Neither was there much enthusiasm for the Norwegian proposal that the Western proposal should be related specifically to increased assistance through existing United Nations agencies in order to prevent Soviet political exploitation of their aid contributions. The main objections to Mr. Lange's proposal were (a) that the U.N. is not set up to provide investment capital assistance which is the form of aid most urgently needed and (b) the political difficulty resulting from the division into voting blocs in the U.N., which in this case would mean a division between those who are potential recipients and the potential suppliers many of whom are colonial or former colonial powers.

Non-interference — Arms Deliveries

13. There was little interest in the idea in the Working Group paper that the West should propose at the Summit a general discussion of limiting the supply of arms to certain regions provided any arrangement included all states which participate in unilateral or multilateral security arrangements with the West or the Soviet bloc. Canada spoke in favour of raising the question at the Summit providing it were set forth in terms which would provide for general application of any arrangement to all exporting and importing countries. Mr. Green also suggested that it Mr. Khrushchev should show any interest in the subject, which is closely related to disarmament, agreement might be reached to refer the problem to the Ten-Nation Disarmament Committee for detailed examination.

Consultation with the Council

14. Concluding the discussion, Mr. Spaak spoke of the general satisfaction which had been expressed by ministers on the degree of consultation with NATO on Summit problems and enquired whether it would be possible for the three to keep the Council informed from day to day during the Summit meetings. When Mr. Herter and Mr. Lloyd indicated the practical difficulties involved in attempting such continuous consultation, Mr. Spaak suggested that the three might consult the Council in the event some new proposal should arise at the Summit the substance of which had not been dealt with in NATO. There was no comment on this from the three, and at the close of the discussion the impression was left that a flexible procedure would suffice, probably involving a report to the Permanent Council by one of the foreign ministers at the end of the Summit Meeting.

SUMMIT PREPARATIONS — SCHEDULE OF MEETINGS

Following is text of schedule of meetings relating to Summit preparation which has been agreed to by U.K., U.S. and French governments and will, we understand, be circulated at NATO Council Meeting tomorrow. Our comments going forward in immediately following telegram. Text Begins: Summit Preparations

A. Schedule of Meetings

The date of 2nd May for the NATO Ministerial Meeting in Istanbul has already been proposed to the Council by the Turkish Government and it is hoped that agreement can be reached on this date at the meeting of the Permanent Council on the 13th January.

2. If this is agreed, the proposed schedule of all meetings associated with the Summit would be as follows:

(1) The United States, United Kingdom, French and German Foreign Ministers would meet in Washington on 13th and 14th April, to consider progress in the Summit preparations.

(2) The North Atlantic Council Foreign Ministers Meeting would be held in Istanbul beginning the 2nd May.

(3) There would be a meeting of the United States, United Kingdom, French and German Heads of Government in Paris on the 14th-15th May.

(4) The Summit Meeting would be held in Paris. The period beginning 16th May has been set aside; the termination date is not certain.

(5) The Foreign Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom and France will be available to report to the Permanent Council in Paris on the Summit immediately after its termination.

3. This schedule has been devised to ensure the best possible arrangements for full NATO consultation at the Ministerial level before the Summit takes place and to ensure a report by the participating Foreign Ministers directly to the full NATO membership immediately after the Summit Meeting.

B. Arrangements for Preparatory Work

4. A Four-Power Group consisting of the United States Secretary of State and the British, French and German Ambassadors will meet regularly at Washington to co-ordinate the Western positions for the East-West Summit. When disarmament is the subject of discussion in the co-ordinating group the Italian and Canadian Ambassadors will be invited to attend. The North Atlantic Council will receive regular reports on the progress of the preparatory work.

5. Detailed preparatory work will be carried out as follows:

(1) Germany Including Berlin: A Four Power Working Group will meet at Washington.

(2) East/West Relations: The NATO Council itself is regarded as the principal forum for co-ordinating the views of the membership. In order to provide the closest possible working relationship between this activity and the preparations for the negotiations with the Soviets, there will be established an East-West Relations Working Group in Paris attended by a NATO observer.

6. The Five Power Committee (United States, United Kingdom, France, Italy and Canada) for disarmament preparations will be meeting at Washington beginning January 25th. Its work will also be utilised by the co-ordinating group in preparation of the Western disarmament position for the Summit.

SUMMIT MEETING PREPARATIONS

Our immediately preceding telegram† contains text of a schedule of meetings left with the department by the UK High Commissioner this afternoon. It was reported that this was an agreed document which had been drawn up by the UK, US and France and which would be presented by the NATO Council on January 13 for consideration. Canadian views were sought on proposed arrangements for preparatory work on disarmament whereby when disarmament was the subject of discussion in the Coordinating Group in Washington the Canadian and Italian Ambassadors would be invited to attend.

2. We would not look with favour on arrangements which would constitute formal approval of a system of consultation whereby the three major powers, with Germany, would reach decisions on questions of general interest to the Alliance. As for disarmament, the proposals are unsatisfactory[17] since they bring the five Western members of the Committee under the Coordinating Group. The inclusion of Germany should be questioned.[18]

3. The Italian Ambassador approached the Department this afternoon to outline the worries of his government over the proposed arrangements whereby the preparations of topics of general interest would, by the establishment of the Coordinating Committee, be left in the hands of the Four. On this point our views are set out in the preceding paragraph. We believe that the most acceptable way to overcome the disadvantages of the proposed coordinating arrangements is to assure the effective consultation through the Council.

4. From what we know of the views of the Italians, the Turks and probably others, it should not be necessary for you to take the lead but you should attempt to strengthen the relationship of the Council to the detailed preparatory work to be carried out by the various working groups. We expect that in this you would have the support of the Secretary General.

5. Since we can foresee trouble developing in the Council in respect of paragraph 4 of the Three-Power Paper, we have asked the U.K. High Commissioner here to request his authorities to postpone discussion of this paper until a later meeting of the Council. In any case, you should have a word with your U.S., U.K. and French colleagues with a view to amending paragraphs 4 and 6 of the paper to which we take serious objection.[19] We would suggest that the second sentence of paragraph 4 be replaced by the following "As far as disarmament is concerned, the five Western Powers participating in the Disarmament Committee, who will be reporting regularly to the NATO Council, will have the responsibility for preparing the Western position on disarmament for the Summit." In the circumstances, delete the last sentence of paragraph 4 and all of paragraph 6.

SUMMIT MEETING PREPARATIONS

I would like the missions in London, Washington and Paris to speak at a suitably high level to explain the basis of our criticism of the proposed arrangements for Summit preparations. I wish this to be handled on a bilateral basis with the three major powers and thus to avoid if possible the divisive effects of an open proposal to the NATO Council to exclude Germany from the Coordinating Committee. Please make it clear that while we would continue to object, as we have consistently, to any formal approval being exacted from members of the Alliance to arrangements which would have the effect of establishing a special position for some members in relation to questions of general interest, we are also concerned with the need to maintain efficient and secure arrangements for consultation and preparation. I believe that the suggestions made in the Three-Power paper can be amended to achieve both these objectives.

2. The special position of the Three Western Powers who will attend the Summit Meeting is recognized but Canada has always insisted the other members of the Alliance should be fully consulted on a basis of equality on policy questions of general concern. Subject to this consultation we would, therefore, have no objection to the adoption by them of some Three-Power consultative arrangements to prepare for the Summit Meeting. But we do object to the addition of a non-negotiating power to the proposed coordinating group.[20]

3. Canada has also recognized the special entitlement of Germany to be included in the consultations on questions of Berlin and Germany.

[20] Cette phrase a été ajouté par Green./This sentence was added by Green.

4. As I made clear in Paris, I believe that the Five Western Powers on the Disarmament Committee are the proper group to prepare the Western position for the disarmament discussions.[21] This was recognized in practice in Paris by holding the meeting of the five foreign ministers on whose behalf Mr. Pella subsequently reported to Council. I continue to hold the view that this is the proper way for disarmament preparations to be carried out, whether for the Ten-Power Meeting or for the Summit. The fact that the three negotiating powers are members of the committee should remove any objections and make unnecessary a review of the preparatory work of the Five-Power Working Group by any Summit Steering Committee.

5. It is our belief that arrangements of this kind can be justified on the ground that those members of the Alliance who have special interests or responsibilities are associated with the preparatory work. This is both reasonable and efficient and avoids any question of according a special status arbitrarily to any of the non-negotiating powers. Effective consultation with the Council would continue to be the indispensable requirement of satisfactory preparations.

6. It might be well to recall that when the question of Summit preparations was under discussion in the Council on December 22 I stated the Canadian views quite clearly in these terms:

"The Nations of the Alliance apart from the Big Three, I believe, have every reason to insist that this Alliance must be an Alliance of equals and that there must be complete and adequate consultation ..."[22]

SUMMIT PREPARATIONS

Initial reactions in London and Washington to our criticisms of Three-Power paper have suggested two additional points which might be made directly in the three capitals or in the Council on Wednesday should the subject be discussed.

2. The historical explanation for the inclusion of a non-negotiating power in the committee structure to share responsibility for coordination, including general questions, brings out one of the very dangers which are at the basis of our reservations about the proposals. Last spring the East-West consultations in prospect were concerned largely with Berlin and Germany, other issues arising generally because of their consequential connection with these two problems. Now the forthcoming East-West Conference has a very different seating as described in the letters of invitation from the three major powers to Premier Khrushchev in December.[23] It is this fact which makes it difficult for us to accept that arrangements which were justified in 1959 should be repeated in the new and different situation with the resulting consolidation of a precedent which is damaging to the essential equality of membership in the Alliance.

3. There is a suggestion that Council approval for the establishment of a Three-Power Steering Committee might encounter the objection that it was a step in the direction of accepting the controversial proposals which General de Gaulle put forward in 1958.[24] It has consistently been the Canadian view that this is not repeat not the way to meet this difficulty. Full consultation on the basis of equality within the Alliance is in our judgment the only effective way to reduce the concern about the possible development of a political directorate. The possibility that Council approval for the establishment of a Three-Power coordinating committee might be interpreted as consolidating a trend in that direction could be minimized by making it clear that the Three Powers members of the Coordinating Group owe their qualification to the fact that they are in this particular instance to be the negotiating powers and moreover that their responsibility for determining tactics and procedures for the negotiations do not repeat not amount to a mandate in the field of political decision on topics of general interest to the Alliance.

4. Since meetings of Mr. Herter with the three ambassadors have already taken place it would probably prove difficult to try at this stage to establish a Three-Power coordinating committee in a formal way. Instead we are attracted by the suggestion made to USA by UK, and mentioned to Mr. Drew by Hoyer Millar, that coordinating arrangements be carried out as necessary without the formality of establishing a coordinating group. It is of course essential that in preparation for the negotiations the Three Powers should have a good deals of consultation and that since Germany and Berlin will assume the central focus of Summit discussions consultations by the Three with Germany must also be frequent and penetrating. The Disarmament Working Group made up of the Five would simply report to their respective governments and to the Council of NATO. On Germany and Berlin Four-Power consultation including Germany would be conducted in the regular way. The Working Groups on East-West contacts would simply report through the NATO Council with which they will be closely associated. In this way the Three Powers would obtain direct info from their own representatives on Working Groups and would get NATO views from the examination by the Council of the Working Group reports.

5. In practical terms this procedure would not repeat not lessen the effectiveness of Summit Meeting preparations and it would have the advantage of not repeat not damaging the principles to which we have referred in our previous telegrams.

SUMMIT MEETING PREPARATIONS

I thought it safer to take the initiative in speaking to the German Foreign Office about the Canadian concern over arrangements for the Coordinating Committee in Washington than to run the risk that the Germans might receive garbled accounts of our position through one of the three nations we have consulted. I therefore called on January 19 on Carstens who is in charge in the Foreign Office of coordinating the German preparations for the Summit Meeting.

2. I begin by referring to my last call on him on November 27, 1959 when I had discussed with him our concern about the possible effects on NATO of proposals for increased political consultation among the Six. At that time I had left with him your statement to the NATO Council of October 28.[25] I reminded him of what you had said then. I also referred to your statement in the Council on December 22.[26] I emphasized that we recognized fully the special position of Germany with reference to the item on the Summit agenda on Germany and Berlin. Our Prime Minister had expressed to General de Gaulle over a year ago the firm opposition of Canada to a tripartite political directorate.[27] We were equally opposed to developments which might lead to a quadripartite political directorate.

3. Carstens thanked me for having taken the initiative in explaining the Canadian position. He then launched on an exposition of the German position.

4. The thesis he advanced was that all the three subjects on the Summit agenda were linked and that the only way in which Germany could protect its special position (which we recognized) on the item on Germany and Berlin was by sitting on the Four-Power Coordinating Group. The main reason the three items were indissolubly linked was that there would be strong pressures on the Western Powers to come to some result at the Summit and if it looked as if no repeat no agreement were possible on two of the items pressures would develop to make concessions on the third item and that third item might be Germany and Berlin. Another way in which the three items were linked was in the bargaining which might take place at the Summit Conference by which a concession by one side on one item might be balanced by a concession by the other side on another item.

5. The normal procedure was for the defeated power to be present in discussions of a peace settlement. If it were not repeat not for the existence of the DDR the Federal Republic of Germany would be represented at the Summit in the discussions on Germany and Berlin. This inability to be a participant at the Summit put Germany in a unique position.

6. It was therefore of vital importance to Germany to sit on the Coordinating Group.

7. Carstens added that the Four-Power Coordinating Group in Washington was not repeat not to be a Steering Committee but a Committee to coordinate views which would be submitted to the NATO Council before final decisions were taken. Germany agreed with Canada that the NATO Council must be the main group in the discussion of issues on the Summit agenda.

8. Moreover, as they had already explained to the Italians, the Four-Power Coordinating Group would have Canada and Italy added to it when it discussed disarmament questions.

9. Another point he made was that Germany was not repeat not asking to be made a member of each of the three main working groups under the Coordinating Group. The only working group it insisted on participating in was the one on Germany and Berlin. They did not repeat not ask to be a member of the Working Group on East-West relations or that on disarmament. Germany might of course sit on one or more of the sub-committees of the Working Group on East-West relations.

10. He asked me to transmit these views to you and he hoped that they would be given sympathetic consideration.

11. I said I would immediately transmit to you in full this most interesting exposition of the German position. I knew you would examine carefully the possibilities of finding some solution to the special German difficulties. I would however be lacking in frankness if I were to leave him with the impression that I believed you would withdraw your opposition to a Four-Power Coordinating Committee on all the items on the agenda of the Summit Meeting. The Soviet and Western governments were now committed to a series of Summit Meetings. The precedent set in the preparation for the first meeting was therefore important. We were concerned lest a Four-Power Coordinating Committee might become a Four-Power Western Directorate. We knew that Germany had been opposed to General de Gaulle's proposals for a Three-Power directorate. I was sure that the German objections would not repeat not be removed by a change from three to four powers.

12. I am leaving on January 22 for a week in Berlin and will be paying a visit to Mr. Pierce in Brussels at the beginning of the following week, returning to Bonn in February 3. Perhaps shortly after my return to Bonn it might be possible for you to send me a message on which I could base a further talk with Carstens.

13. Might we not repeat not soften the effect on the Germans of our opposition to their claim for membership on a Four-Power Coordinating Group if we were to tell them that we recognize that they have a special position in the framing of Western proposals on disarmament because Germany will soon be militarily the third strongest member of the Western Alliance and would have been an obvious choice for membership on a Ten-Power UN Commission if it had not repeat not been the USSR from being a member of the UN [sic].

SUMMIT PREPARATIONS, DISARMAMENT AND NATO

Council meeting February 3 may be important. As you will recall, USA, UK and French delegates have so far refrained from telling Council what their governments have in mind with regard to a coordinating committee for Summit preparations, and its relationships with working groups and the Council. For this reason, only the Italians have so far attacked proposal in Council, although the plan is generally known in NATO. Turks and Belgians have been ready to attack but have refrained until they see what can be arranged between the Three and Germans. Meanwhile reports of a German-Italian deal may lead others to press their claims to participation in one form or another. The Three must therefore clarify their position soon.

2. In wake of Chancellor Adenauer's visit to Rome, it is now becoming clearer what German and Italian governments want and how they think they can help each other to achieve their objectives in summitry. At the same time as we had suspected from our talks with USA, UK and French delegates here, these three have come to conclusion that if they include Germany on a coordinating committee amounting to a directorate for Western Summit preparations in all fields, there will be trouble in NATO which may have serious ramifications in several areas of Western policy.

3. Many of these difficulties could have been avoided, and probably still can be avoided, if Western negotiating powers convince the other members of Alliance that they are really being consulted. There is no repeat no special virtue in NATO Council as such, but it is the logical forum for such consultations at [document déchiré/torn] trouble about general assurances, which were given in very satisfactory terms last month at Ministerial Meeting, is that too many decisions in recent months have in fact been taken by the Three or the Four without wider consultation.

4. In these circumstances I would appreciate your instructions before February 3 Council Meeting and more specifically whether you would agree that I should take a position on following lines:

(a) All three working groups (Germany and Berlin, Disarmament, and East-West relations) are equal before Council and report to Council direct. (This is not repeat not of course the same thing as accepting Turkish thesis that working groups are in effect dependencies of Council. This is an extreme position and has little support or, in our opinion, justification.)

(b) Working groups report in parallel (i.e. at the same time) to national governments represented and to Council. No repeat no decision will be taken by negotiating governments before Council has been consulted. (This is the position agreed during ministerial meeting last month as a result of Mr. Averoff's intervention.)

(c) Any working group should have the right to request joint meetings on an ad hoc basis with any other working group in cases where their interests appear to overlap. If working groups are physically separated (e.g. Washington and Geneva) such a joint meeting could take place in Washington with ambassadors concerned, but there is no repeat no need for these arrangements to be institutionalized.

(d) There would be no repeat no objection to UK, French and German ambassadors in Washington constituting, with Mr. Herter, an ad hoc coordinating group provided it were understood that they were to be concerned with coordination of tactics and procedures in preparation of future negotiations with Soviets on Germany and Berlin (your telegram S-20 January 18). It would of course be assumed that this group would, like the others, consult with NATO Council as appropriate, although it would be recognized that it would be inappropriate for Council to become too directly involved in negotiating tactics.

5. We see no repeat no immediate need to discuss in NATO the pattern of pre-summit ministerial meetings following NATO Ministerial Meeting in Istanbul, but if those concerned agreed to a framework of relationships such as that suggested in previous paragraph, it would probably follow that some form of ministerial consultation could take place before May 16 Summit Meeting involving for their respective subjects, ministers of all countries taking part in working groups. These ministerial consultations will obviously cause less difficulty in NATO if some national procedure has been agreed upon in advance which would provide an objective reason for turning down requests from other NATO countries who might like to participate in the more restricted pre-summit ministerial meetings.

SUMMIT PREPARATIONS

On the basis of the two useful reference telegrams I think policies can be adopted which will help NATO to move forward from its present procedural impasse and will facilitate Summit meeting preparations.

2. I approve the position you propose in sub-paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of paragraph 4. of your telegram 260 January 29.

3. As to paragraph (d), I would prefer to see the coordinating group idea disappear altogether but I realize that the three negotiating powers are in a difficult position since some meetings have taken place and since the Germans are sensitive about the bargaining position on Berlin. If the question of the coordinating group comes up you could inform the Council that we realize that the questions of Germany and Berlin will probably again play a central part in the East-West meeting and could live with an arrangement whereby the tactics and procedures for negotiation with the Soviet Union on these questions would be coordinated by having the Working Group meet as needed at the level of ambassadors with Mr. Herter.

4. I am interested in the prospect you mention of some form of ministerial consultation based on working group membership taking place before the Summit Meeting. I can see merit in such a procedure but do not repeat not wish to come to a decision until the possibility is raised in definite form.

SUMMIT PREPARATIONS

In view of our earlier discussions with the State Department on the procedures for Summit preparations, when seeing Ivan White and later Fessenden on other matters yesterday, we drew attention to the three points outlined in subparagraphs 4(a) (b) and (c) of NATO Telegram 260 January 29. We did not repeat not, however, make any comments beyond those previously made with respect to our views on a Four Power Coordinating Group. White said that he hoped to hear later in the day that the proposal for a Four Power Coordinating Group would be dropped; he later confirmed this, adding that it had only been dropped after considerable discussion with the Germans. White also expressed interest in considering some formula for ad hoc joint sessions of particular preparatory groups should this seem desirable.

2. This morning we saw Hillenbrand, the Head of the State Department's German office, to enquire about progress on the working group dealing with Germany and Berlin. Only one or two preliminary meetings had been held staffed by the State Department and the local embassies concerned. It was unlikely that experts would participate until perhaps some time in April. Hillenbrand said that while the disarmament group was taking a new look at the overall Western disarmament position, in the case of the preparations for a Summit discussion of Germany and Berlin, a great deal of the ground work both with respect to the overall Western plan and Berlin proposals had already been done last year. These proposals would, of course, be reviewed, and papers on various peripheral subjects would be prepared, but Hillenbrand thought it would not repeat not be realistic to expect radical departures from existing positions. He referred to the public debate which had taken place in the German Press, and in reply to our question, said that it was not repeat not yet clear to what extent the Bonn government subscribed to previous Four Power positions particularly with reference to a modus vivendi for Berlin. The positions of the various governments would only become clear as work proceeded.

3. Hillenbrand thought that part of the German difficulty at any rate arose from the fact that the German authorities consider that the Western proposals on Berlin represented a point beyond which they could not repeat not go, and this gave rise to tactical problems of how the related questions of Germany and Berlin should be taken up with the Russians. Hillenbrand said that he looked to the Ten Power talks on disarmament as providing some clue, beyond Khrushchev's repeated statements, as to Soviet intentions.

4. Hillenbrand said he would be glad to keep in touch with us from time to time as the work of the four proceeded, but indicated that we should not repeat not look for early conclusions.

5. With regard to the problem of a Four Power Coordinating Group, he said that the question had become one of prestige for the Germans, but that personally he had been happy to see this proposal dropped.

EAST – WEST CONTACTS: REPLY TO NATO

In preparation for the summit meeting in May, the NATO Council is carrying out an examination of the experience of member governments in their contacts with the Soviet Union and the Soviet bloc countries. A questionnaire has been sent to member governments. Apart from detailed replies to the questions, which are in the course of preparation, it is proposed to submit on behalf of the Canadian Government a general statement of our experience.

2. In the field of East-West contacts a number of other NATO countries have considerably expanded their relations with the Soviet Union and other countries in the Soviet bloc. The United States, United Kingdom and French Governments have gone furthest in developing contacts. United States activities include exchanges of visits by the President and Premier Khrushchev, Vice-President Nixon and Vice-Premier Koslov, governors of states and premiers of the Soviet republics, many technical and cultural exchanges, exchanges of students, national fairs in New York and Moscow, and prestige periodicals. The United Kingdom has taken the lead in the matter of exchanges of leaders, Khrushchev and Bulganin's visit to Great Britain in 1956 being their first to a NATO country and Prime Minister Macmillan's in 1959 being the visit which initiated the recent reduction in tension. Apart from this, there have been numerous student and technical exchanges and many business and personal visits. The most important initiative by France has been President de Gaulle's invitation to Premier Khrushchev. Among visits by other Western government leaders, the most notable have been those of President Gronchi (the first Western head of state to go to the Soviet Union), Chancellor Adenauer, Premier Hansen of Denmark, and the exchanges of visits between the Norwegian and Polish Foreign Ministers.

3. The major Western governments, including the United States, United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy and Norway have all found it advantageous and efficient to negotiate cultural agreements with the Soviet Union as a means of controlling exchanges and improving their bargaining position. These governments have also demonstrated the importance which they attach to exchanges by providing funds to facilitate them.

4. Since our Delegation will be expected to give some indication of the general policy which the Canadian Government can be expected to follow in future, I wish to submit for approval the attached memorandum which reviews the policy which the Government has followed to date and indicates in very general terms the lines along which I suggest the Government might best work in the future.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 22, 1960

CANADIAN POLICY ON EAST – WEST CONTACTS

Background

Soon after Stalin's death in 1953 the Soviet Union adopted a new policy on contacts with the West. Whereas formerly the Soviet leaders, including Stalin, rarely travelled abroad, after 1954 they began to do so. Movement between East and West grew also at other levels — scientific, cultural, and to some extent tourist. At the Geneva heads of government conference in 1955 the Soviet leaders confirmed their new policy, and visits between Soviet bloc and Western countries expanded rapidly.

2. The Canadian Government, like most other Western governments, decided that although there were certain risks involved in contacts with the Soviet bloc, on the whole Canada had much to gain from them. Canada knew relatively little about condition in the Soviet bloc, whereas Soviet bloc countries had easy access to public information about Canada. Canada therefore stood to gain from any programme of exchanges where balance was preserved. Moreover, visits in either direction could contribute to breaking down Soviet misconceptions about Canada and the West generally. Canada therefore adopted a policy of permitting a modest number of exchanges with Soviet bloc countries. Sufficient control was maintained, however, to ensure that the exchanges remained in approximate balance. Under this system, there took place during 1955 and 1956 some official exchanges and also exchanges in cultural, technical and other fields. These continued until October 1956, when suppression of the Hungarian uprising by Soviet troops led Canada and other Western countries to defer all plans for exchanges of visits with the USSR.

3. Along with other NATO countries Canada agreed to a cautious resumption of exchanges in 1957. By mid-1958 exchanges of all kinds were again taking place. In some fields these were more frequent than before, although in total number and scope still somewhat limited.

Present Situation

4. Although the Canadian Government has kept under careful review the problem of contacts with the Soviet bloc, there has been little change in policy and practice relating to them. In June 1958 the Government adopted a somewhat revised policy for exchanges, under which they were to be broadly reciprocal, limited in number, of benefit to Canada, and not employing communist organizations in Canada as hosts.[28] An inter-departmental visits panel, which from 1956 onwards had been responsible for maintaining a degree of government control and supervision over exchanges, was continued.

5. In implementing this policy the Canadian Government submitted to the Soviet authorities in August 1958 a programme of official exchanges and also gave some encouragement to private visits. In this and other ways the Canadian Government has endeavoured to match the [28] Voir volume 24, chapitre IV, 3e partie./See Volume 24, Chapter IV, Part 3.

Soviet willingness to develop exchanges. The Soviet Government, however, was slow in responding to the comprehensive suggestions that were put forward, and in the end refused to accept them. While they showed interest in scientific exchanges, they apparently decided that the Canadian proposals carried with them excessive security risks. For example, they categorically rejected proposals for exchanges relating to northern development in both countries. Despite this, however, the National Research Council, a Canadian Government agency, reached an understanding with the Soviet Academy of Sciences for an exchange of scientific personnel. Some visits of senior government officials have taken place in both directions in such fields as fisheries, meteorology and agriculture.

Special Problems

6. A special problem has arisen in that Soviet authorities have avoided official relationships in exchanges and instead have promoted exchanges with private Canadian groups and individuals in spheres of interest to them. Because the Canadian Government does not restrict travel abroad, it has not exercised any system of control on such exchange arrangements. Furthermore, Canada's federal structure makes for difficulty in arranging exchanges which involve private Canadians. The situation is further complicated by the lack of distinction on the Soviet side between official and private exchanges.

Assessment of Results

7. Personal Exchanges. Canadian experience has shown that personal contacts of all kinds, including tourism, education exchanges and visits of scientists, are advantageous to the West because of their influence on people in the countries concerned. Their effectiveness is confirmed by the fact that such exchanges are normally resisted by Soviet bloc authorities, despite what they say to the contrary, unless there are strong compensating advantages. The influence of personal contacts is exerted in several ways. First, they help to fill gaps in the knowledge which ordinary Soviet people have of the West, gaps created mainly by a lack of reliable information and by the tendency of the ordinary Russian not to believe much of what is printed about the West in Soviet newspapers. Russians are inquisitive where Westerners are concerned, and are disposed to believe what Westerners tell them. What they see in Western countries is even more effective than what they hear from Western visitors. Furthermore, since many Russians seriously accept such basic Marxist concepts as the inevitable decline of capitalism and the decadence of the West, discussions with Westerners and first hand impressions of Western countries help to shake these beliefs, and to allay suspicions held by the ruling classes and, to some extent, by ordinary people that the West has aggressive intentions. Finally, they serve to make Soviet citizens aware of the disparity between their own standard of living and degree of political freedom and those of most Western countries. In this way there is some strengthening in the slight pressure which Soviet public opinion can exert on the Soviet Government for improved material conditions and greater freedom.

8. Technical Exchanges. There have been advantages to both sides in Soviet-Canadian exchange visits in the technical field. The benefits have probably been somewhat greater for the Soviet side since in many industrial fields they are not as far advanced as Canada. At the same time, Canadian technical specialists have acquired useful information about certain techniques developed by the Russians. In addition, of course, such exchanges often result in close personal contacts, with the consequent advantages described above.

9. Artistic Exchanges. The Russians have devoted great attention and expenditure to arrangements for presentation in Canada of performances by artistic groups and individuals. Because the Soviet Union has a large population with a long artistic tradition, and is willing to use state funds to arrange performances abroad, it is able to send to Canada a more impressive array of performers than Canada can send back. There is no doubt that such famous Soviet groups as the Bolshoi Ballet and the Moiseyev dancers make a strong impact on Canadian public opinion, whereas Canadian performers in the Soviet Union, although they have been acclaimed by audiences, do not become widely known. For these reasons artistic exchanges between the Soviet Union and Canada are usually to the advantage of the Soviet Union. It is considered important, however, to continue with some exchanges in this field in order to develop broad arrangements which will include other visits which Canada regards as advantageous.

10. Exchanges of Information. Through private connections, often facilitated by both governments, a good deal of trading of technical information is taking place in science, education and industry. Such exchanges, if reciprocal, are useful to both sides technically and often lead to important personal contacts. It is evident that if an effective means could be found to spread information about Canada in the Soviet Union, a large and receptive audience would be available. Most Russians are eager for accurate and detailed information about life in the West. Soviet information activities in Canada, while free of restriction, are thought to be relatively ineffective because of their heavy weight of blunt propaganda, and their inappropriateness for Canadian interests. Western countries stand to gain by almost any exchange of information, but the barriers raised by the Soviet Union to the influx of ideas narrowly limit what can be done.

Future Policy

11. With an improved international atmosphere and with the example of visits by government leaders, as well as of summit meeting discussions, there is certain to be steadily increasing pressure, not only from communist governments but also from people in the West, for increased contacts. It is realized that the Soviet bloc countries drive a hard bargain in avoiding the kind of exchanges they dislike and insisting upon those exchanges which are of the greatest advantage to themselves. It is, however, important for NATO countries to meet this challenge and to develop policies and practices through which they can both guard against one-sided arrangements which are chiefly to the gain of the communist countries and adopt methods which will permit the greatest possible influence to be exerted upon the people of the communist nations.

12. The Canadian Government, having reviewed recent experience in its relations with the Soviet Union and other member countries of the Soviet bloc, has come to the conclusion that while certain disadvantages and risks are involved, there is much to be gained by NATO countries in expanding the programme of exchanges with the Soviet bloc. More particularly, the Government intends to take advantage of opportunities to increase exchanges, with special emphasis on those which bring about personal knowledge by Soviet citizens of Canada and Canadians. Likewise, appropriate information media will be exploited in such a way as to increase the knowledge by Soviet citizens of Canada. The Government has decided that in the event that a trade agreement should be signed with the Soviet Union, a minister should visit Moscow to sign the agreement.[29] In view of the experience of other NATO governments in the matter of exchanges of visits by senior government leaders this seems an appropriate way of expanding contacts.

13. Finally, despite constitutional and other difficulties, the Canadian Government is at present examining the implications of a possible cultural agreement with the Soviet Union along the lines already followed by several other NATO governments.[30] Such agreements appear to provide a framework within which further development of exchanges can take place and a greater degree of control can be exercised to improve the Western bargaining position and maintain a proper balance of benefit on both sides.[31]

NATO SUMMIT PREPARATIONS — EAST-WEST TRADE

In connection with NATO preparations for the Summit meeting in May, we have been asked by the Secretary-General of NATO to answer a questionnaire which includes a substantial section on possible economic relations between Western countries and the Soviet bloc. The first two economic questions are:

(a) Should the countries of the West propose at the forthcoming summit meeting discussion of the economic relations between East and West, with special reference to trade?

(b) Should the Western countries not take the initiative in this matter, would it nevertheless be desirable to discuss these questions on a proposal by the Soviet Union?

In addition there are a number of detailed points on particular problems that might arise in East-West trade, such as possible credits, etc,. These detailed points seem to have been selected arbitrarily and do not include the important question of possible use by the Soviet Union of disruptive trade practices to further export sales.

The immediate question to be answered is whether we should encourage Heads of Government of the United States, the United Kingdom and France to discuss East-West trade with the U.S.S.R. at the Summit meeting in May and, if so, how far they should try to go in such discussion, and what line it would be in our interests for them to take.

In a short Summit meeting there would certainly be little time to devote to trade matters, and the exchanges would probably be limited to a few broad generalizations reflected perhaps in a passage in a communiqué. In any event this would not be an appropriate forum for a detailed examination of trade matters, first because governments would normally be represented for trade talks by Ministers other than Heads of Government and, second, the group is much too small and unrepresentative. Any substantial discussions on East-West trade would be of great and direct concern to Canada, and if they are to be held, the Canadian Government must be one of the participants. It would therefore be preferable not to comment on the points of detail at this stage and to make it clear that if substantive East-West trade discussions are to be pursued this must be in a broader group with Canadian participation.

The remaining problem is to give Canada's reply on the question whether there should be any trade item on the Summit agenda. Here there are several basic considerations:

(a) The effort to reach peaceful settlements of some of the main outstanding problems between the Soviet bloc and the West can hardly be reconciled with a refusal to accept growing East-West trade relations. If we hope to move towards agreement on such questions as disarmament, it would seem that we should also be prepared for more normal trade relations. Indeed closer and mutually beneficial trade relations could over time make a positive contribution to the relaxation of East-West tension. Moreover, greater Soviet dependence on international trade could be a factor of advantage to the West to the extent it represented a limitation on the freedom of action of the Soviet authorities.

(b) There is growing Soviet bloc participation in world trade and with the growth of the Soviet economy, further trade between the East and West will inevitably develop. Many of our Western trading partners, including the United Kingdom and France, have already concluded bilateral agreements with the Soviet Union designed to strengthen their trading relations and increase trade. Canada is presently negotiating a new agreement with the Soviet Union looking to an expansion of trade in both directions.

(c) Owing to the similarity of Canadian and Soviet export products, greater Soviet bloc participation in world trade may well cause difficulties for certain Canadian exports, and may tend to bring down world market prices for some of them.

From the above it would appear that greater U.S.S.R. participation in world trade is bound to occur and that from the point of view of the West as a whole, such a development may not be without advantage. On the other hand, Canadian export interests could be affected adversely. It will be important therefore to ensure that trade relations between the U.S.S.R. and Western countries are developed on an orderly basis, including arrangements to deal with disruptive U.S.S.R. marketing practices should these arise.

The conclusion which seems to emerge is that if the U.S.S.R. wishes to have an item on trade on the Summit agenda, the Western powers should not refuse. They could refer in general terms to the need for orderly and mutually advantageous trade relations between the U.S.S.R. and the West. They should indicate quite clearly that the Western countries will not tolerate disruptive trade practices in their markets. This could provide the basis for a further discussion of a substantive nature at a later stage and in a larger forum including Canada.

One problem which the Western leaders would have to think about before discussing trade with the Russians at the Summit is the matter of strategic restrictions. When the U.S.S.R. speaks about "normalizing trade" what they have in mind is almost always the elimination of the COCOM restrictions on strategic goods. Presumably the Western leaders would have to make it clear that they intend to continue controls which are required for strategic purposes while pointing out, perhaps, that they had been very much modified and do not affect a large range of commodities in which trade is possible.

In view of Canada's mixed interests in this whole question, it would hardly seem appropriate from our point of view to recommend to the Western powers to take the initiative in proposing a Summit agenda item on East-West trade.

It is therefore recommended that Canada answer the NATO enquiry in the sense of this memorandum, i.e., that the West should agree to a preliminary discussion in broad terms of East-West trade if the U.S.S.R. should propose it. In such a discussion the Western leaders should stress the desirability of developing East-West trade on an orderly and sensible basis and the need for the U.S.S.R. to avoid disruptive selling practices. If it should appear, following the Summit meeting, that further discussion of East-West trade of a substantive nature should be desirable, it should be arranged to be held in a forum in which countries with such direct interest as Canada would be full participants.[32]

PROPOSALS FOR A POSSIBLE "CODE OF CO-EXISTENCE"

The NATO Council and its Working Group on East-West relations have been considering the possibility of submitting at the Summit Meeting a statement of general principles to govern relations between states. It has been suggested that such a statement would offer the West an opportunity to take a more progressive stand than the Soviet Union by proposing that the concept of co-existence be extended to one of co-operation which might be applicable in many fields, including foreign aid.

At its meetings on March 24 and March 30, the Council discussed two proposed drafts of a statement along these lines. One of these, prepared by Mr. Spaak, was essentially a declaration which set forth conditions which would permit maximum progress towards the pacific settlement of disputes through negotiation and which defined the principles the Western countries intended to follow in relations with other nations. The other draft, prepared by the Working Group, was based on the premise that the West should point out the inadequacies and limitations of the Soviet concept of co-existence and that true peace could result only from the substitution of a broader and richer notion of mutual comprehension and co-operation.

In these discussions doubts were expressed about the advisability of taking the kind of declaration envisaged in the two drafts to the Summit. There was general agreement that to attempt to reach agreement with the Soviet Union on a declaration of principles would expose the West to a variety of risks without offering much hope of genuine acceptance by the Soviets. There was support, however, for trying to make limited progress in achieving some sort of code of good conduct to be applicable during the proposed series of Summit meetings. It was agreed, moreover, that while the decision to use any draft code would, of course, depend on the circumstances at the Summit, a draft ought to be ready in case it was needed.

Both the United Kingdom and France have been giving some thought to the form which such a "Code of Co-existence," to use Mr. Selwyn Lloyd's term, might take. Mr. Lloyd is known to be considering various ideas under this general heading, all of which presumably are designed to obtain from the Soviet Union a recognition that peaceful co-existence in a period of détente should mean something more than the mere continuation of the struggle between East and West by every possible means short of war. France has suggested that the proposed code should include agreements on aid to under-developed countries, non-intervention by the Great Powers in the internal affairs of other countries and restraint on the part of the Great Powers in the sale of arms to neutrals. The French, we are informed, have submitted a draft declaration to the Working Group under three general headings: Tolerance, Co-operation and Liberty. It is expected that the Foreign Ministers meeting in Washington on East-West relations may work out a directive for the preparation of a final draft code comprising the best of the British and French ideas as well as those expressed in the NATO Council by Mr. Spaak and the representatives of other members.

SUGGESTED CANADIAN ATTITUDE

There has not so far been a requirement for Canada to formulate a final policy on this proposal. It is possible, however, that it will come up in your informal discussions in Washington, and it will of course be an important topic at the Ministerial Meeting in Istanbul.[33] I have therefore been giving some thought to the attitude Canada might usefully adopt. I would agree with Mr. Léger's comment in the NATO Council that it is to be hoped that the communiqué issued at the conclusion of the Summit Meeting will announce agreement at least to hold a further Summit Meeting, and with his suggestion that if this is the case an agreement on certain principles of conduct during the series of Summit Meetings would be desirable.

The West should be wary, however, I think, of a specific and detailed code which would amount to drawing lines over which the powers should not step. It would be unhelpful and perhaps even dangerous to seek for rules which could only have different and contradictory meanings for East and West. Any suggested Four-Power code should, therefore, be concerned more with concrete principles of action than with abstract concepts. The essential aim of the West should be, I think, to bring the Soviet Union as far as possible towards a concept of co-operation, with the minimum cold war content, as opposed to a concept of mere "co-existence."

If, however, the Summit Meeting should fail to the extent that agreement is not reached even on the convening of a further Summit Meeting, the West might best consider, as has already been suggested in the NATO Council, the issuance of a more general declaration of principles of its own. This possibility should be considered especially, I think, in the event that Khrushchev takes the lead in submitting a declaration of Soviet principles. It would then be to the West's advantage to offer a corresponding statement of its views largely in the expectation that the two would cancel each other, and the Three-Power draft already discussed in the Council would provide a satisfactory statement of the Western approach.[34]

KHRUSHCHEV'S SPEECH OF MAY 7

I was present when Khrushchev made his second speech to supreme Soviet on May 7.[35] As a rule ambassadors merely receive tickets of admission. This time Foreign Ministry phoned Embassy to inform them that Khrushchev would make an important speech at noon. Hence we expected a sensation and unfortunately were not repeat not disappointed.

2. It was an unhappy occasion for Western diplomats. At first we could not repeat not believe our ears but when Khrushchev gave detail after detail about the plane incident, including photographs which pilot had taken, we were forced to conclusion he was substantially telling the truth. Khrushchev had cleverly avoided giving info that pilot was alive in his first speech[36] in order to substitute what explanation of orders from State Department would give. The State Department fell into the trap. USA Embassy for example circulated a statement "that there was absolutely no repeat no deliberate attempt to violate Soviet air space. There never has been."[37]

3. Khrushchev got a [Group corrupt] reception from deputies. His vein of righteous indignation mingled with [2 group corrupt] humour went over well. All in all it was a great occasion for Khrushchev but not repeat not for the West.

4. Khrushchev no repeat no doubt now considers himself to be in an [2 group corrupt] position. If there is a summit, President Eisenhower Khrushchev hopes will be on defensive. If the West backs out of a summit Khrushchev can blame the West for failure to hold a summit conference. Either way he no repeat no doubt considers that he stands to win.

USA PLANE INCIDENT

At a Czech reception today Khrushchev made it clear he proposes exploit this incident to fullest extent. In full view of large gathering Khrushchev selected USA Ambassador for a long private talk.[38] Afterwards Thompson told me that though Khrushchev was personally friendly he was so angry about incident that the intends to bring it before Security Council. [If] positions were reversed USA would Khrushchev said do same thing. Khrushchev seemed equally angry about State Department's false statement May 5 and its frank statement May 7.[39] The second statement Khrushchev said indicated that Americans intended to continue with this practice.

2. In his speech at reception Khrushchev made great play about inability of American Embassy to know what its military people were doing. He made two serious statements. One, that if this practice continued USSR would take steps to wipe out the base from which the plane operated; and two, that if he signed a peace treaty with East Germany and the West used force to enforce their so-called legal rights, the USSR would use sufficient force to stop them.

3. I think Khrushchev clearly wishes to go to the Summit Conference posing as champion of law and order.

NATO AND THE SUMMIT

You will recall that there was some discussion at the Istanbul meeting regarding consultations in the Council both during and after the Summit meeting. Mr. Herter and Mr. Lloyd indicated the practical difficulties involved in attempting to implement Mr. Spaak's suggestion that the Council be kept informed from day to day during the Summit meetings. When Mr. Spaak went on to suggest that the Three might consult the Council in the event some new proposals should arise at the Summit, the substance of which had not been dealt with in NATO, there was no comment from the Three. At the close of the discussion the impression was left that a flexible procedure would be sufficient, probably involving a report to the Permanent Council by one of the Foreign Ministers at the end of the Summit meeting.

At the Permanent Council meeting on Wednesday, Mr. Léger raised this matter in general terms (see attached telegram No. 1319 of May 12.)† He suggested,

(a) that in the spirit of the Istanbul meeting there should be consultation in the Council on any Western proposal which differed from presently agreed policy; and

(b) that there should be a post-mortem session of the Council immediately after the Summit meeting, attended by one or more of the Foreign Ministers of the Three.

Although the United Kingdom representative was clearly hesitant about committing his Government to NATO consultations during the Summit, he did not dissent from Mr. Spaak's interpretation that the Council should meet if anything really new was contemplated by the Western negotiators. There was also general agreement that there should be a Council meeting immediately after the Summit attended by one of the Foreign Ministers of the Three.

We believe that Mr. Léger's intervention was particularly useful since it had the effect of clarifying the responsibilities of the Three in respect of the NATO Council both during and after the Summit meeting. However, since Mr. Léger made it clear that he was acting without instructions, we think it would be desirable, if you agree, that you indicate your approval of the general line he has taken.

A telegram advising him to this effect is attached for your signature, if you agree. You will note that we have also included the suggestion that he might inquire privately of the Council representatives of the Three whether it might not be possible for their Governments to provide the Council with an interim report on the progress of the Summit negotiations at the Council's next regular meeting on Wednesday, May 18.[40]

SUMMIT MEETING: NATO DISCUSSIONS

In discussing in the NATO Council the aftermath of the disruption of the Summit Meeting I think it would be useful to underline our assumption that the current East-West discussions in regard to nuclear tests will continue despite the rupture at the Summit and that the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee will meet as planned on June 6. In terms of East-West relations it seems of the utmost political importance to have disarmament under discussion.

2. Khrushchev's announced intention of proceeding to East Germany and press reports of assertions by his officials that he might sign a peace treaty raise again in our minds the nature of the contingency planning that has been adopted by the Three Western Powers. This was outlined in an unrecorded session of the Ministerial Meeting of the Council in April 1959. The Belgian Foreign Minister mentioned it briefly at Istanbul and was told by Mr. Herter that there had been to change. In view of developments since Istanbul I think it would be well if the Council were to request the three to indicate whether they still intend to implement the plans outlined at the Washington Ministerial Meeting.

3. If discussion in Council deals with the possible reasons for Khrushchev's behaviour the following very tentative analysis may be useful to you.

4. It does not seem to us likely that Khrushchev has wrecked the Summit as a result of any loss of power within the Soviet Union which forced him to abandon his policy of détente against his will. All the evidence at the present time points on the contrary in the direction of Khrushchev's growing personal authority. In January he decreed the demobilization of a large part of the Soviet armed forces, over the opposition, which he himself admitted, of the generals. Early this month he rearranged the government and party apparatus in such a way that, as far as we can see, his own position was made stronger and his own chosen men put unequivocally into the influential positions.

5. A more likely explanation is that since his meeting with President Eisenhower last fall Khrushchev has reassessed Western Summit intentions. At the time of his meeting, influenced by Eisenhower's personal presence and acknowledgments that the Berlin situation was "abnormal,"[41] Khrushchev may well have calculated that he could get a sufficiently advantageously agreement at the Summit to justify his policy of détente, and to mollify his critics within the bloc and within the Soviet Union.

6. Over the past eight months Khrushchev may have had cause to re-examine this assessment. Following closely the relations among the NATO countries he may well have concluded that so far as Berlin was concerned he would probably return empty-handed from the Summit. Reading recent speeches of Vice-President Nixon and Messrs. Herter and Dillon,[42] he may have concluded, with some justification, that the American line had definitely hardened. It was these speeches which were one cause of his own truculence in the Baku speech of April 25.[43] Khrushchev may have concluded that at best the Summit might have achieved agreement on a limitation of nuclear testing which, without an agreement on Berlin, would only have exposed him to sharp criticism from those who have opposed his policy of détente from the beginning — notably the Chinese. He may therefore have seized upon the airplane incident as a convenient excuse for modifying that policy, at least temporarily, and avoiding the Summit Meeting.

NATO AND THE SUMMIT

In an editorial this morning, copy of which is attached,† the Globe and Mail has called for a NATO Heads of Government meeting in order to develop a programme in the present situation that expresses the collective view of the fifteen members of the Alliance. It argues that the U.N. can and should be brought into the picture but not immediately, and that the first thing to do is to have a meeting of the NATO Heads of Government, which has not taken place since December 1957, following the launching of the Soviet Union's first Sputniks.

In considering this suggestion I think we should remind ourselves that the main reason for calling a special meeting of the Heads of Government in 1957 was to give urgent attention to the implications of the Russian scientific successes in launching an ICBM and satellites which had the effect of fundamentally altering the strategic position of NATO. Moreover, the meeting was called in haste, had no agreed papers before it and yet had to deal with the most fundamental problems affecting the whole future of the Alliance. The conclusions arrived at were related to such important matters as the establishment of stockpiles of atomic weapons and the stationing of IRBMs in Europe, in terms which are still not entirely clear to the Governments concerned with the implementation of these decisions.

Undoubtedly, we are faced with a critical international situation as a result of the collapse of the Summit meeting. However, the situation so far as NATO is concerned is different from 1957. As the Prime Minister indicated in the House yesterday, Soviet tactics have had the effect of unifying rather than dividing the Alliance. It seems to me that the real task now facing the Alliance is to hear the report of the Western Three on the breakdown of the Summit, to take stock of the situation and to decide through intimate and close consultation the most constructive course to be followed in dealing in a calm and purposeful manner with the important problems which lie ahead. Above all, I think that we should avoid creating the impression of panic or crisis in the West and endeavour to maintain a sense of perspective and balance. To call in haste a meeting of the Heads of Government of NATO would, it seems to me, be unwise. The inevitable publicity surrounding it could well have the effect of heightening international tension and of raising public expectations which would probably not be realized. In the event the course of developments in the next few weeks should make it appear advisable to have a NATO Heads of Government meeting, it would, I think, be important to prepare the ground carefully in order to warrant the time and effort involved and in order to ensure the success of such a meeting.

In the circumstances, I think that what is required is a series of consultations in the Permanent Council to devise the most constructive approach to the problems which lie ahead, which might be followed in two or three weeks' time by a meeting of the Foreign Ministers. If at that time it became evident that a meeting of Heads of Government would be advantageous, then a decision might be made.

In the event you are questioned about this in the House this afternoon, I attach draft notes† which might form the basis of your reply.

I also enclose an extra copy of this memorandum and its attachment which you may wish to give to the Prime Minister in the event a question is directed to him.

USA PLANE INCIDENT

Khrushchev's intransigence has prevented Summit Conference from meeting and Eisenhower from visiting USSR. Why? A reasonable view is that since his visit to de Gaulle, Khrushchev has realized that he would obtain nothing of substance at Summit to justify his policy of détente to his critics in USSR and other socialist states. A damaging blow to his personal prestige would follow and the plane incident gave him an unexpected opportunity to change his policy and demolished his critics behind him. Khrushchev no doubt hoped his personal prestige would not repeat not suffer but this is doubtful. Having reversed his tactics he can be expected to exploit incidents to greatest extent.

2. The above may be an over-simplified explanation. The Swedish Ambassador thinks Khrushchev had hopes of obtaining some satisfaction from a Summit Meeting. The plane incident and particularly the explanations of Herter and Eisenhower were such that he was bound to react in the way he did. Emphasing undertaking by Eisenhower not repeat not to continue these flights was not repeat not enough and to satisfy amour propre of Soviet people some expression of regret was necessary.

3. I have spoken to Polyansky and Pavlenko a former minister of power stations. Their views give some support to those of the Swedish Ambassador. They were particularly angered by American assumption they were superior beings and Russians inferior beings who could be treated with contempt. The USA had to treat USSR as an equal. The President said he would stop these flights as if he were granting a favour. This was not repeat not enough. Some expression of regret was necessary to satisfy Soviet honour.

4. Incidentally Pavlenko and Czech Ambassador both thought Khrushchev would not repeat not sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany immediately. The reason Pavlenko gave was that Khrushchev was only committed to do this after failure of a Summit Meeting. In fact no repeat no Summit Meeting has been held. After Khrushchev's visit to East Berlin we should know the answer.

5. Undoubtedly a period of tension is beginning. I have warned the staff to be careful particularly about contacts with Russians.

NATO ATOMIC WEAPONS — MEDIUM RANGE BALLISTIC MISSILES FOR NATO FORCES IN EUROPE

At the 1959 December Ministerial Meeting General Norstad reviewed the progress made in implementing the 1957 NATO Heads of Government decision relating to the establishment of IRBM's in Europe.[44] He mentioned specifically the progress which has been made in setting up such missile units in Italy and Turkey. He then went on to refer to the need for having "second generation" solid-fuelled IRBMs (henceforward referred to as Medium Range Ballistic Missiles, MRBMs) which would be lighter and more mobile and have a range between 300 and 1500 miles. He referred to a military requirement for 50-100 of these missiles by 1963 and an annual increment up to 300.

To meet this requirement the USA Secretary of Defence, Mr. Gates, made an offer at the recent Defence Ministers' meeting in the following terms:

(a) The Polaris missiles would be available for sale to European countries who would make their own arrangements for production of the launching equipment. The USA would be willing to provide some MDAP funds for the programme. The nuclear warheads would be provided by the USA, which would retain custody of them until their release was authorized by the President in event of hostilities. The conditions imposed would be (i) that the programme be approved by the NATO Council (ii) that missiles be under SACEUR's control (iii) that there be an advance commitment to accept storage of nuclear components (iv) there be an advance commitment to deploy the missiles to meet SACEUR's requirements.

[44] Voir/See Volume 24, document 256.

(b) As an alternative to (a) the USA is prepared to provide technical assistance for the establishment of a multilateral production capacity in Europe for the missile. The same conditions listed under (a) would apply.

In presenting his proposal Mr. Gates indicated that the USA would greatly prefer alternative (a). The French Minister of Defence did not react very favourably to the US proposal. He said that when the French Government had given its approval in principle to the equipment of NATO forces with such missiles they had not thought that they should be provided exclusively for SACEUR. He indicated that the proposal required "a good deal of study." Mr. Watkinson's preliminary view was that the purchase of the missiles would probably be the most expeditious and economical solution but he agreed that the proposal required further study. The outcome of the discussion was inconclusive but there was general support for the idea that proposals should be studied by the military authorities and the Council.

The matter was next discussed at the meeting of the Permanent Council on April 6 when the Norwegian Delegate explained at length the policy of his government in respect of the establishment of bases and the stockpiling of nuclear warheads on Norwegian territory. The discussion as reported in the attached telegram No. 1029 of April 6 from NATO Paris† reveals clearly that the USA would like to get a general blessing from the NATO Council for the acceptance of MRBM's, leaving the details to be worked out on a bilateral basis with interested countries and avoiding any general discussion in the Council of NATO nuclear policy. M. Spaak, supported by a number of representatives, was strongly in favour of a full discussion in the Council of the fundamentals involved. The UK and French representatives gave tentative support for the US proposal but did not challenge the desirability of a full discussion as advocated by M. Spaak.

It was finally agreed that the USA proposals should be considered in the Council after the Summit meeting, some time in late May. In the meantime the Secretary General will discuss with the Standing Group in Washington next week the kind of information which they could provide for a Council discussion. He will report the results of his conversations to the Council, at which time a decision could be taken as to what questions, if any, should be put to the military authorities.

Canadian Position

Mr. Léger's intervention in the discussion was limited to reminding the Council that one of the conditions of the USA offer was that the programme be approved by the NATO Council. He said that he had no idea at this stage what Canada's position on this subject might be, but that he was certain that the Canadian Government would wish to be consulted throughout the negotiations if there was any question of the deployment of these missiles in or near areas occupied by the Air Division or the Brigade.

I think it would be premature to attempt to formulate a Canadian position on the US proposal until the receipt of further information and pending M. Spaak's report to the Council following his visit to Washington. I would think it advisable, however, that Mr. Léger be instructed to lend Canadian support to a full Council discussion of the USA proposal following the Summit meeting. There are, it seems to me, a number of aspects (e.g. the question of bilateral as opposed to NATO Council control over the weapons and the question of where they will be deployed) which need to be fully discussed before giving Canadian approval to the USA proposal.

ATOMIC POLICY OF THE ALLIANCE: MRBMS

I called on General Norstad accompanied by General Kitching and inter alia discussed with him problems raised by Secretary-General's suggestion that Council should address itself to USA proposal on MRBMs and his own commitment to brief Council on this matter. SACEUR acknowledged this and during conversation made following points:

(a) He was afraid that opinion might be building up against the setting up of MRBMs in central Europe and was concerned lest the opinion of the Council would be so adverse as to make the positioning of these missiles very difficult. His reply to such adverse reaction of some European members of NATO was that it would sow the early seed of "America first policy" which would spring from a continued refusal by European nations to face up to their own defence problems.

(b) He admitted that there would be a very critical political problem if France continued to refuse to harbour USA warheads on French territory. The MRBM programme in his view could not repeat not possibly be implemented if an excess of 200 of these weapons had to be placed on German soil. He was mildly optimistic however and believed that some arrangements could be made with France in the next two or three years which would permit the latter to accept "upwards of 50 or 100" of those weapons on French territory. (This should not repeat not be interpreted to mean that French authorities would necessarily be asked to accept the present type of USA controls over warheads: General Norstad rather gave the impression that some new formula might be worked out which would make it easier for the French to accept stockpiles of warheads on French soil.)

(c) General Norstad mentioned several times that the target date for the bringing into use of the MRBMs was "not repeat not before 1965 or 66." He had raised the question generally because of the required lead time to get the necessary planning and production under way. In his opinion once the decision had been taken to plan for these weapons and for their production the question of how many each country could be asked to absorb could well be left for two or three years. He did not repeat not think it would help the Alliance if this crucial question had to be answered at the present time. In this respect he thought that a discussion in Council would have to be handled with great care since "no repeat no one should ask the Germans to take these missiles nor should anyone tell them that they could not repeat not have them." The total number in any event would be distributed not repeat not only on the mainland but also on certain islands, on waterways and at sea. The whole operation would require time and a good deal of "finesse." He should not repeat not therefore be pressed too hard in Council.

(d) We did not repeat not have time to discuss at any length the problem of controls. General Norstad merely said that the formula now applying to arrangements with the Italian government would also apply to the programme for the Polaris.

2. Throughout the conversation General Norstad showed serious concern over developments in this field, particularly if matters were allowed to drift much longer. There was a military requirement for such missiles and it had to be met one way or the other. The political implications however were very serious: his main concern, as expressed above in paragraph 1(a), was the likelihood that unless some satisfactory arrangement was arrived at, the USA in due course would be led to disengage from Europe. There was the very serious further complication that if in the meantime West Germany was heavily provided with MRBMs and France was not repeat not, the equilibrium on the continent would be completely upset. In this respect he cited an instance when some time ago he had been approached by Defence Minister Strauss who, after having learned that two squadrons of IRBMs were to be positioned in Europe, pointed out that Germany was very interested in obtaining these squadrons and more or less asked when they could expect delivery of the hardware. General Norstad took the line at that time that he did not repeat not plan to move IRBMs into Europe regardless of what stories Defence Minister Strauss might have heard of their availability in the USA. In order to offset some of the complications with which the Alliance was faced General Norstad had over the last few months suggested that Europeans should assume joint responsibility specifically in the field of MRBMs and even more generally in the atomic field. He added: "Politicians don't seem to see the dangers ahead and I cannot repeat not do more than I did. Because of the bad reception these views of mine have received in Washington and London I don't intend to pursue them any further."

3. Reverting to a more specifically Canadian interest General Norstad said that as a result of Canadian and Dutch concern SHAPE were now preparing a study explaining the requirement for both missiles and manned aircraft during the next few years. In his view these weapons were complementary and were designed to be used together as part of the overall weapon system. Their joint use had seemed so normal to him and his staff that they had not repeat not considered that an explanatory paper was necessary when the requirement for the 300 Polaris was made first to the Standing Group and then during the meeting of defence ministers. However he had realized his mistake and the study is now nearing completion. He remarked that a zero launch take off capability can now be built into the 104G during the production stages for a figure of about $45,000 extra per plane. This figure had been given by the Lockheed expert and he had asked A/M Dunlap to pass it on to General Foulkes. It would probably cost five times as much if the modification had to be done to the aircraft after production. This modification would give the 104G an almost vertical take off capability, thus overcoming to a considerable extent its vulnerability and dependence on long runways.

4. General Norstad's views as expressed above raise far-reaching issues. We will try and send you shortly more considered comments on this complex problem. I am not repeat not sure that further info will lead to greater clarity. From now on two ounces of doctrine may be better than two pounds of facts. The starting point of the present problem is a military requirement for the setting up of 300 MRBMs in the European periphery of the Soviet empire. This 1400 mile missile is described by the military as a weapon to be used against tactical targets; it could as aptly be described as the new strategic arm of SACEUR. This requirement is made at a time when Norway and Denmark have reiterated their decision not repeat not to have such weapons on their territory; when France will not repeat not accept the conditions under which they are offered; when it is considered that it would be politically unwise to build up too heavy a concentration of such missiles in West Germany; and, more important, when our own preoccupations on disarmament may have an impact on the whole future of NATO. An easy but in my view very deceptive conclusion would be to say that the USA initiative is most inopportune. Such a conclusion could only conceivably be reached if we knew more than we do about Soviet intentions, not repeat not to mention capabilities. What is fairly clear from here however is that the future of the Alliance may rest upon the capacity of its members to formulate and implement an atomic policy generally satisfactory to its members. Immediate Canadian interests may not repeat not be too apparent; the launching from any given territory of just one of the 300 MRBMs now under consideration would force us to look at the problem in a more fulgurating light.

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], June 1, 1960

MEDIUM RANGE BALLISTIC MISSILES FOR NATO FORCES IN EUROPE

I think that it might be useful if you were to discuss with President Eisenhower[45] the United States' plans regarding the introduction of Medium Range Ballistic Missiles for NATO Forces in Europe.

In my memorandum to you of April 12, copy of which is attached, I reviewed briefly the announcement of General Norstad at the 1959 Ministerial Meeting regarding the need for such weapons in Europe, the statement by the United States Secretary of Defence at the NATO Defence Ministers' Meeting in March outlining the terms of the United States' offer to provide such weapons, and the discussion which followed. It was agreed at the Defence Ministers' Meeting that the U.S.A. proposal should be considered in the Council after the Summit some time in late May. It was also agreed that the Secretary General would discuss with the Standing Group in Washington the kind of information which the NATO military authorities might provide for a discussion in the Permanent Council.

During the Defence Ministers' Meeting Mr. Pearkes expressed the view that since the U.S.A. proposal had far-reaching consequences it should be discussed fully in the Permanent Council and the Military Committee (which would consider the military implications and requirements of such weapons). He also stressed that no publicity should be given to this proposal because of the effect such an announcement would have on the disarmament negotiations.

The information we have received to date suggests that the military authorities of most of the NATO countries are agreed on the military requirement for such weapons but have come to no conclusions regarding the manner of their deployment or the precise date when they should be introduced. It does appear, however, that the United States and the NATO military authorities at SHAPE are thinking in terms of introducing between 50 to 100 missiles in 1963, to be increased to 300 by 1965. The missile they have in mind is the POLARIS, which has a range of between 300 to 1500 miles and is lighter and more mobile than the medium range ballistic missile units which are being set up in Italy and Turkey.

[45] Voir le chapitre III, 1ère partie.
See Chapter III, Part 1.

Our impression is that General Norstad will probably make, in the near future, a short general report to the NATO Council indicating the broad NATO military requirement for such weapons. His report may take into account the views of the NATO Military Committee (which were supported by the Canadian military authorities) that "maximum flexibility and dispersion depend in large measure upon the ability to deploy MRBMs anywhere in NATO Europe including adjacent maritime areas" and "that the greatest value of this weapon system (MRBM) will best be achieved by the broadest possible geographic national deployment throughout NATO Europe ..." We expect that following any discussion which may develop in the Council, General Norstad will indicate that he plans to work out, on a bilateral basis, with the European countries concerned, plans for the deployment of these missiles which would be introduced in some three or four years' time.

My concern does not relate to the fact that there will be discussion in the Permanent Council in the near future, but rather to the possibility that there may be pressure for a NATO decision or a public announcement regarding plans to strengthen NATO through the introduction of these weapons. It seems to me that to attempt to come to any decision (which undoubtedly would become public knowledge) or to make a formal announcement would have very serious disadvantages as follows:

(a) By announcing what must be regarded as a notable increase in Western strength in Europe, it would introduce an element of inflexibility into the Western negotiating position in a period were a certain amount of equilibrium has developed between the opposing sides.

(b) France is known to oppose the acceptance of these weapons on the terms provided by the Americans. Since the majority of them would consequently be deployed in Germany, a decision at this time could have the effect of increasing German influence in the development of any Western negotiating positions.

(c) It might be interpreted by the general public as a reaction to the collapse of the Summit or to recent Soviet statements about retaliation against any countries who decide to launch or are involved in the launching of U-2 flights over Soviet territory.

(d) Any decision or announcement would undoubtedly be regarded by the Soviet Union as evidence of Western unwillingness to move towards a détente and provide material for those elements in the Soviet Union and Communist China which are suspicious of Western intentions and insist that the Western political authorities are dominated by military elements bent on an aggressive war.

In the circumstances you might wish to raise some of these points with the President, emphasizing in particular our misgivings about the advisability of any formal NATO decision or announcement at this time regarding the proposed large-scale introduction of MRBMs in Europe. At a time when the West is counselling moderation and patience and is emphasizing its willingness to negotiate all outstanding issues it would seem highly important to avoid any action or decision or announcement on the military front which would appear inconsistent with our proclaimed political aims and attitudes.

Memorandum

SECRET [Ottawa], June 13, 1960

MEDIUM RANGE BALLISTIC MISSILES FOR NATO

The United States appears to be anxious to press ahead with further discussion and consideration of its offer to make POLARIS medium range ballistic missiles available for deployment in Europe in three or four years' time. At the NATO Defence Ministers' meeting last April, when the United States offer was first made, it was agreed for political and psychological reasons to postpone any further NATO discussion of this matter until after the Summit meeting.

Since then consideration has been given to the problem mainly on the military front. The military authorities of most of the NATO countries are agreed on the military requirement for such weapons but have come to no specific conclusions regarding the manner of their deployment or the numbers required. The views of the Military Committee (which were supported by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff) are that "maximum flexibility and dispersion depend in large measure upon the ability to deploy MRBMs anywhere in NATO Europe, including adjacent maritime areas ..." and "that the greatest value of this weapon system (MRBMs) will best be achieved by the broadest possible geographic deployment throughout NATO Europe ..."

Last Friday the members of the Permanent Council were given a briefing by General Norstad, who underlined the military requirement of MRBMs. Impressive evidence was adduced to prove that the number of targets which had to be successfully engaged if NATO shield forces were to fulfill their function as part of a credible deterrent, could only be dealt with if SACEUR was provided with a second generation ballistic missile in the period 1963-65. SACEUR explained that such a mobile flexible system of MRBMs would remedy major deficiencies in shield forces, including the vulnerability of currently planned strike forces which mainly consist of aircraft on fixed bases. But he stoutly maintained that the requirement for strike aircraft would continue at least for the next ten years because, unlike missiles, they can be used selectively. They would not, however, be able to carry out their proper function unless the way through the Soviet air defence system was cleared for them by MRBMs. The conclusion of the briefing was that the deterrent capability of SACEUR's command would be gravely reduced if some such weapons system as MRBMs was not introduced in the period 1963-65.

The discussion which followed dealt mainly with the questions of deployment of these weapons and the effort which would be required from each country to meet the military requirement. After a good deal of argument, SACEUR reluctantly admitted that the Military Committee's views regarding the need to be able to deploy these weapons anywhere in Europe constituted a general reply to the question of deployment concerning which he was at first not anxious to express any opinion; he added that the weapons might possibly move from country to country on train or truck mounts. He also gave the impression that he would prefer that substantial numbers of MRBMs be sited in France, Italy, and the Eastern Mediterranean area, and that arrangements for the installation of these weapons would be worked out bilaterally between his headquarters and the individual countries. The outcome of the questioning was a decision that SACEUR should meet again with the Council on the subject of MRBMs and provide further advice on the question of deployment.

Mr. Léger raised the question of the rôle of the Council in respect to decisions concerning the weapons. He pointed out that if agreement were reached to include the weapons in the NATO arsenal, the result would have policy implications of the most important kind for the East-West balance of power. He said he would expect, therefore, that decisions with respect to MRBM proposals would be joint decisions taken in Council. Significantly, no member of the Council questioned his statement in this regard.

From General Norstad's remarks, he appears to be thinking in terms of bilateral arrangements with the host countries similar to those which have already been worked out in connection with the installation of ballistic missile sites in Turkey and Italy. To date there has been virtually no discussion of those arrangements in the Council and control over their use is essentially a question of a joint decision between the United States and the respective host country. To continue with the same procedure would, it seems to us, considerably weaken the solidarity of the Alliance for much of this new defensive strength would be governed by a series of bilateral arrangements between the United States and the countries in which they are to be stationed.

Assuming the majority in the Council agree with the estimated military requirement for such weapons in the period 1963-65, our tentative view is that it would be in order for the Council to note the military requirement for such weapons and to give approval to SACEUR's making provisional plans to introduce them. It should, however, be understood that such approval would not authorize him to enter into any bilateral or multilateral negotiations concerning their deployment or use.[46] Such authorization as might be necessary should only be given when the Council, at Ministerial level, has had an opportunity to consider the implementation of the military plans in the context of the political and other problems involved. Such problems might appropriately be dealt with in the long-term planning studies which will probably be ready for Ministerial consideration at the annual December meeting. Possibly final approval might be reserved for a NATO Heads of Government meeting early in 1961 when a new United States President will have assumed office.

The main advantage of such an approach would be that it would provide a limited mandate to the NATO military authorities while reserving any final approval until the Ministers of the member countries have had an adequate opportunity to consider the long-term implications of this proposed new addition to NATO defensive strength. Among the long-term implications to be considered would be the political effect within the Alliance if the United States or the military authorities were to insist on continuing with the present practice of bilateral arrangements.

At the same time, it would be important to insist on avoiding any publicity regarding current or future Council discussions regarding these weapons. Any public decision or announcement would introduce at least the impression of inflexibility into the Western negotiating position on East-West issues and would open the West to Soviet charges that it is not seriously interested in moving towards a settlement of current international issues, particularly in the disarmament field.[47]

FUTURE WORK OF COUNCIL

I called on Secretary General to discuss with him programme of Council meetings between now and August recess with particular reference to Gates proposals on Polaris missiles, NATO long-term planning and disarmament.

2. Gates Proposals. Secretary-General reported that he had been unsuccessful in Washington in convincing administration that some way be found partly to meet French preoccupations which might lead to General de Gaulle accepting on French soil some of the missiles offered by Gates. He had been successful however in convincing them that a discussion in Council would immediately expose the impossibility of reaching agreement. SACEURs proposals therefore, as outlined in document PO/60/437, have already been pigeon-holed. The reason given by Washington is that after further consideration it is thought that whatever Polaris missiles are to be provided to NATO should be extremely mobile and possibly all water-based. Mr. Spaak was not repeat not clear yet as to whether this meant that new proposals would be made involving the provision of submarines and/or barges carrying Polaris missiles. In any event the new proposals are not repeat not likely to be submitted to Council for some time, certainly not repeat not before September and possibly not repeat not before the new president has taken over in Washington.

3. There will therefore not repeat not be any discussion in Council of this matter until after August recess at the earliest.

4. In concluding this part of his exposé of the work of the Council in the weeks to come Mr. Spaak reaffirmed his view — which I fully share — that the future of the Alliance fundamentally lies in developing, particularly between USA, UK and French, and also among all members, a generally acceptable atomic policy. He is not repeat not unhopeful that this might be achieved once the new president has taken over in Washington and some pressure has been brought to bear on General de Gaulle. He is discussing these problems with French at present and has already had what he termed "not repeat not too unsatisfactory conversations" with Messrs Couve de Murville and Debré and is to follow up these conversations with a discussion with General de Gaulle during the next few days.

Long-Term Planning.

5. Secretary-General referred to his document "First Thoughts on the Ten-year Plan" forwarded to you under cover of our Letter No. N-997 July 11.† During August he intended to continue to reflect on this subject and amend his own paper in some respects if necessary. Meantime he very much hoped that this draft will be considered by member governments so that a fruitful exchange of views can be held some time in September. As a result of this a new document would be prepared. Depending on developments he was considering the possibility of visiting NATO capitals sometime in October and November to discuss the new draft with a view to coming to agreed conclusions in time for December Ministerial Meeting. If in the process it was thought that the holding of a seminar attended by senior officials and experts would be worth while, a decision could be taken in September after the first round of discussion has been held.

6. Here again Secretary-General is not repeat not sanguine about the progress that can be made until the new president has taken over in Washington. However he still is attracted by the Prime Minister's idea of holding a Heads of Government Meeting some time in new year, possibly in the spring, if the progress made between now and then is such that important decisions for the future of the Alliance could be announced.

7. Here again therefore the Council will not repeat not be seized of the ten-year planning until mid-September.

8. Secretary-General is still unclear as to the fundamental differences between Washington and Paris on disarmament. At the next Council meeting he would expect French to have circulated their statement made in Council on July 13 (paragraph 6 my Telegram 1879 July 13).† At that time it would be up to the Council members to support the amended USA proposals or to align themselves with French. He believed that it was not repeat not unlikely that USA's amended proposals could get the support of the great majority in the Council.

9. I pointed to the very great importance we attach to convening the Disarmament Commission as soon as possible. He did not repeat not disagree with this and even thought that from the point of view of public opinion generally it might be advantageous.

10. The only other point Mr. Spaak made on disarmament was to express his strong feeling that at this moment in international affairs it was unrealistic to think that USA and USSR could in fact agree to the implementation of a disarmament scheme which would paralyze their atomic capability. This was not repeat not to be interpreted to mean that discussions on disarmament should not repeat not continue but that possibly it would be wiser to restrict the scope of such discussions somewhat and to revert to more limited objectives such as those of zones of inspection or "open skies." Here again he referred to the fact that the political situation in USA was not repeat not necessarily conducive to immediate results in this field.

11. Mr. Spaak agreed that the subject of disarmament would remain on the agenda of the Council.

MEDIUM RANGE BALLISTIC MISSILES FOR NATO

During his visit to Ottawa in June[48] the Secretary-General emphasized the urgency of reaching a decision in NATO on Mr. Gates' proposal to make POLARIS MRBMs available for NATO forces in Europe in the period 1963-65. Mr. Spaak was informed in Washington that the United States authorities wished, for production reasons, to have a decision by NATO Council by September 1. The urgency of the question was confirmed by Mr. Gates during the recent meeting of the Canada United States Ministerial Committee on Joint Defence[49] when he explained that if SACEUR is to have such weapons by 1963 production must start soon. The difficulty, however, he believed was essentially a political one arising out of the position taken by the French Government.

A recent report from Mr. Léger indicates that Mr. Spaak is now of the opinion that it would not be advisable to raise the matter in Council until some progress has been made in reaching an understanding with the French. Consequently he thought it was not likely that the matter would be discussed until some time in the autumn and possibly later. It was, however, clear that he considered it should come before the Council in due course.

I think you will agree that we would be well advised in the meantime to clarify our own views in respect of this problem. In this Department we are inclined to question the political wisdom of an early decision of this magnitude until we have examined carefully the broad political and strategic considerations involved. Some of our main misgivings are set out on pages 3 and 4 of the attached brief paper which was prepared for the recent Canada-United States Ministerial Meeting.[50]

There is also one other aspect of this problem which lies more directly in your field of responsibility concerning which I would welcome your views. It seems to us that the introduction of these long range weapons in quantity into the NATO shield force involves a basic question of NATO strategy, particularly since the introduction of such weapons would give SACEUR the capability of dealing with targets far removed from the NATO area in Europe and even in the Soviet Union itself. Our impression is that these weapons would give SACEUR a strategic striking capability far beyond the requirements currently envisaged for the NATO shield forces. We find it difficult to reconcile such a requirement with agreed NATO strategy as set out in the basic documents MC14/2 and MC48/2. Moreover, we wonder how it will be possible to explain to the general public how the introduction of such weapons is consistent with the popularly accepted version of the role of the NATO shield. The attached editorial from the London Times of July 9† is a good example of what I have in mind.

In the light of the above I should be very interested to know:

(a) whether the Canadian military authorities agree with SACEUR's estimate of the military requirements for such weapons in the NATO shield forces;

(b) whether you believe such requirements can be justified in terms of current agreed NATO strategy and, if not, whether you think that the current strategy should be modified;

(c) your views on the implications of the introduction of these weapons in the period 1963-65 in terms of Canadian commitments in Europe.

I should be grateful if you could forward your reply by the first week of September.

Dear Bill [Barton],

MEDIUM RANGE BALLISTIC MISSILES FOR NATO

I thank you for your letter of July 29† forwarding copy of a letter to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, about the provision of MRBM's for NATO. This type of background information helps us a great deal in our work here and I would be glad to be kept informed of developments.

General Norstad returned to Paris at the beginning of the week. While he was in Washington he discussed the Polaris programme with the United States authorities. As a result of these discussions it appears — although I shall have to check this further — that a decision was reached to the effect that the present generation of Polaris would all be used by the United States in U.S. bottoms. Liberty ships, for example, could be equipped with a certain number of Polaris and cruise at some distance from European waters but still close enough to meet the military requirements. Up to 80 Polaris missiles could be used for this purpose. Meantime a second generation would become available by 1964 or so; it would be a smaller and more mobile type of Polaris. If arrangements could be reached with some NATO countries by 1964 then this second generation would be provided.

I presume that this decision was taken not only on technical grounds but also because Washington realized that, particularly as a result of the position adopted by the French, they could not get the co-operation they needed to go ahead with the Gates' proposal. I understand however that General Norstad will still wish to obtain from Council in the not too distant future a decision in principle that such weapons are needed for the defence of NATO. Once that decision has been obtained the United States would then go ahead on their own with the plan outlined above. They would not need the assistance of any of their European partners and thus the problem of control would not arise.

I have not had much opportunity to discuss this new development with my colleagues. I had a word about it however with the Permanent Representative of The Netherlands who sees considerable disadvantage in this new scheme. For one thing he points out that whatever proposal is implemented NATO would still have to brace itself to the full blast of Soviet opposition. For another it was not unlikely that in view of the additional expenses involved the United States might consider withdrawing some of their troops in Europe in exchange for this additional protection extended to the Continent. Lastly Mr. Stikker made the point that the Europeans would have no say in the possible use of such missiles and that they would be at the complete mercy of Washington. This he thought, particularly if coupled with a partial withdrawal of United States troops from the Continent, would seriously weaken the Alliance.

I shall try and send you some comments on your letter to Chiefs; I thought however that you should be aware of these new proposals as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

JULES LÉGER

MID-RANGE BALLISTIC MISSILES FOR NATO

1. Reference is made to your letter of 29 July 1960 in which you raise three questions concerning SACEUR's requirement for mid-range ballistic missiles.

2. With regard to your first question, while supporting a continued need for aircraft as part of a mixed strike force offering maximum flexibility, SACEUR based his requirement for the MRBM upon the increasing vulnerability of NATO strike aircraft to surprise attack and their decreasing ability to penetrate enemy air defences. The Canadian representative on the Military Committee expressed agreement in principle. The Chiefs of Staff are of the opinion that SACEUR's argument is sound and that he has a valid requirement for a relatively long range ballistic missile to complement his air strike forces.

3. The Chiefs of Staff have some reservation with regard to the necessity for the specified maximum range of 1500 miles and the quantity of 300 missiles. These are related to targets, deployment, and other operational factors. SACEUR has not yet put forward his deployment plan, so that the Chiefs of Staff cannot agree or disagree specifically. At the same time, it should be noted that if the MRBM is to be available to SACEUR by 1963 it will probably be necessary to accept the POLARIS missile because no tested competitor yet exists. It is clear that, if the fullest use is to be made of NATO geography, a missile with a range approaching 1500 miles is necessary. Such a missile would also give SACEUR a useful measure of flexibility and would tend to minimize total missile force requirements. Lesser ranges would be increasingly restrictive.

4. With regard to your second question, it is primarily a matter for political judgement as to whether or not the MRBM raises a fundamental issue of NATO strategic policy. On the one hand, from a military point of view it need not be so regarded, since the requirement for the MRBM can be justified in terms of the efficient execution of SACEUR's presently assigned mission. On the other hand, it can be argued that the MRBM might represent an extension into the strategic deterrent field of SACEUR's mission which would have significant political consequences. If the latter view were adopted by NATO Council, a thorough review of the political and military policies of the alliance might become inescapable. This is also likely to be the case if it is judged that the present arrangements for the custody and control of nuclear warheads within NATO are not acceptable. Which of these views should be adopted is a matter for political rather than military consideration.

5. From the point of view of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff, it is not necessary to regard the issue as one of strategic policy, since:

(a) it is not contemplated that Canada would play any part in the manning or operation of the proposed POLARIS force, and

(b) any resulting redefinition of NATO strategy will, almost certainly, not affect Canada's present military commitments to NATO. This point is discussed in more detail below.

6. With regard to your third question, the Chiefs of Staff consider that SACEUR has a valid requirement for both the MRBM and strike aircraft such as the CF104. The missile is superior in the role of attack on previously selected targets but the aircraft is markedly superior against target of opportunity. Moreover, it has greater flexibility for use in such roles as pre-strike and post-strike reconnaissance. If SACEUR is to have the ability to make a limited response to Soviet aggression in circumstances which would not immediately warrant the use of MRBMs, or indeed nuclear warheads, he requires manned aircraft such as the CF104 and in the numbers presently programmed. This situation will persist throughout the useful life of the CF104. The missile and the aircraft are therefore essentially non-competitive.

7. It seems clear that the NATO MRBM has no bearing upon the need for or value of the Canadian Infantry Brigade Group.

8. It must be noted, however, that Canada might be called upon to share in the cost of the MRBM through infrastructure or otherwise. At present, it is impossible to say what financial arrangements will be proposed. In the event that Canada were called upon for a substantial financial contribution, the Canadian Government might feel bound to regard the NATO MRBM as a major issue of defence policy bearing upon Canada's future participation in NATO. Again, this is a political rather than a military question.[51]

VISIT OF SECRETARY-GENERAL TO OTTAWA

I called on Mr. Spaak and some of his immediate advisers to try and get a better insight of the pessimistic mood of this otherwise comfortable and energetic man. The following analysis may have some relevancy:

(a) As a Belgian Spaak agrees with de Staerckes' view (paragraph 5 our telegram 1561 June 9)† that in present circumstances Belgium might find more profit in a policy of neutrality than in continuing to be an active member of the Alliance with little say in its decisions but full responsibilities for its actions. He recalls that before the Second World War — and he was intimately connected with these developments Belgium was led to neutrality because of lack of leadership and decision from its more powerful friendly neighbours. This experience has profoundly marked Mr. Spaak and he detects in the present situation certain elements which he found in the mid-30s. He told me that any Belgian political leader could sweep the country with a neutralist platform;

[51] Pour les développements ultérieurs, voir la partie 7.
For subsequent developments, see Part 7.

(b) As a European and an [architect] of the Treaty of Rome the Secretary-General cannot repeat not submit to the type of leadership which is now given to Little Europe by President de Gaulle and echoed by Chancellor Adenauer. While fully in favour of a Franco-German rapprochement, it is his considered view that too continental a lead from Paris and Bonn is not repeat not in the best interest of nor is it acceptable to countries like Italy, Belgium and The Netherlands. He also points out that left on its own, this bloc cannot repeat not and will never be able to resist Soviet pressures. This leads him to be critical of the UK, whose policies on the one hand have led continental Europeans to build up a truncated Europe, while attempting on the other to maintain a privileged position in Washington which in itself does not repeat not add much weight to the defence of Europe as a whole. He is naturally bitter over the line taken by de Gaulle on most NATO issues and is concerned lest if de Gaulle continues to be strongly supported by Washington on prestige matters the Alliance will be weakened considerably;

(c) As Secretary-General of NATO Mr. Spaak feels that the Alliance may be rapidly slipping into its pre-Suez position when political consultation among the major and smaller allies was very meagre. He is particularly wroth at foreign ministers of the USA, UK and France who in Washington a fortnight ago met together to discuss problems affecting NATO. He is clear in his mind — and is aware of the strong line taken by Canada on this issue — that any type of political directorate institutionalized or unavowed would likely spell the end of political consultation in NATO. Here he feels that in practice if not repeat not in theory Washington is giving in to the French. He does not repeat not understand how it is possible for Washington on the one hand to get closer and closer to de Gaulle's views on a directorate and on the other fairly passively to submit to de Gaulle's lack of cooperation on nuclear developments and generally in the field of military integration in NATO. This he partly attributes to a failure of American leadership since the death of Mr. Dulles and is aware that such leadership cannot repeat not be expected for another several months. Meantime in his view the Soviet are making progress on several fronts, mainly in the field of propaganda as reflected in Belgium (see "A" above.) Thus the Secretary-General finds himself in the uncomfortable position — a position of which he is well aware — of being highly critical of the three leading powers in the Alliance. He also knows that for a variety of reasons he cannot repeat not rely on Bonn.

2. Spaak is also aware that at the root of the matter lies the atomic policy of the Alliance. At present there is no repeat no coordinated policy, nor does he see his way clear — at least for the time being — to formulating one that might prove acceptable to all including the USA, UK and France. He is disturbed about developments in the field of MRBMs as a result of Mr. Gates' proposal of April 1.[52] He is satisfied in his own mind that the military requirements for the setting up of a considerable number of Polaris in continental Europe must be met in order to face the Soviet threat. On the other hand, he cannot repeat not reconcile himself to a formula whereby those weapons would be distributed by SACEUR on a bilateral basis to those countries of the Alliance willing to accept them, thus further pushing France in its atomic nationalistic isolation and upsetting the atomic equilibrium in continental Europe.

3. These seem to be the main preoccupations of the Secretary-General at present. Whether or not repeat not he will raise them all in Washington during his visit there is difficult to say. He told me that he felt very strongly about the directorate and the Gates proposal and that he would discuss them with the State Department.

4. Most of my colleagues believe that the Secretary-General is overly pessimistic. Before giving my own interpretation I think a distinction must be made: if NATO powers are satisfied with developments in the military and political fields during the last 12 months or so, including preparations for the Summit meetings, then I agree with by colleagues that Mr. Spaak is in the dumps. If however an attempt is to be made "to build higher on strong foundations," as the Prime Minister suggested at Depauw University, then the Alliance will need a very serious shot in the arm.[53] I can only see this coming about as a result of a better understanding in the field of atomic weapons. The stakes are so high, particularly as between the USA, UK and France but indeed among all of us, that they can only be considered in the end at Heads of Government level. Hence the importance of the Prime Minister's proposal.

CONVERSATION WITH MR. SPAAK — I

Following is a brief summary of the main points made by Mr. Spaak in a meeting in Mr. Green's office at 10 A.M. on June 17:

(a) Mr. Spaak drew attention to the absence of real consultation in NATO on disarmament. He said that the five Western members of the Ten Nation Committee in Geneva were acting independently of NATO and were not taking their NATO partners fully into their confidence. In this way, the Western Five were guilty of exactly the same failure of consultation as was the so-called directorate of the U.S., U.K. and France. He thought it unfortunate that there had been no serious discussion in the NATO Council on the latest Soviet disarmament plan.

(b) Mr. Spaak emphasized the importance of avoiding a clash over disarmament between the United States and its Western partners in the Geneva negotiations. He thought that United States opinion was in a delicate state as a result of so many recent setbacks and he was afraid that unless the members of the Alliance stood together, isolationist tendencies might appear. He estimated that unless United States forces in Europe were equipped with atomic weapons on terms satisfactory to the United States, the United States might become impatient with its commitment in Europe, with the consequential danger that the Germans would assume military domination in Europe. Mr. Green said that he did not think that the withdrawal of United States forces was likely.

(c) Mr. Spaak was critical of Western policy in the Geneva disarmament negotiations. He thought that there should be much more emphasis on control and less on atomic disarmament. When Mr. Green said that emphasis on control and reluctance to take some forward steps in disarmament would place the West in an impossible position in the United Nations General Assembly, Mr. Spaak said that he still believed that the West could have a respectable position if, while insisting on control as a basic element in Western policy, the Western countries made known their willingness to discuss certain schemes such as "open skies" and zones of inspection. Such a position would not be spectacular but he thought it would be more realistic.

(d) Mr. Spaak also thought that consideration should be given to setting up two sub-committees in Geneva — one to study the Soviet and the other the Western plans — and that later the sub-committees might be merged in an effort to see what amount of common agreement might be reached. Mr. Green indicated that this idea might be worth considering.

[53] Voir/See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Statements and Speeches 1959-60, No. 60/21.

(e) Mr. Spaak called attention to the incompatibility of, on the one hand Western efforts to bring about the abolition of nuclear weapons in the disarmament talks, and on the other the current pre-occupation in NATO to equip NATO forces in Europe with Polaris missiles. He thought that this inconsistency carried real dangers for the Western negotiating position.

CONVERSATION WITH MR. SPAAK, JUNE 17, 1960 — II

A meeting with Mr. Spaak was held in the Prime Minister's office, Room 309, House of Commons at 12 noon on June 17. Present on the Canadian side were the Prime Minister , Mr. Green, Mr. Fleming, Mr. Pearkes, Mr. O'Hurley, Mr. N.A. Robertson, Mr. F.R. Miller, Mr. Jules Léger, Mr. C.S.A. Ritchie, Mr. H.B. Robinson. Mr. A. Saint-Mieux was with Mr. Spaak. The discussion lasted for just over one hour and was continued at lunch in the New Zealand Room. After lunch there was a further meeting lasting 30 minutes in Mr. Green's office. The following is a summary of the main points of the discussion.

The Gates Proposals

Speaking of his recent talks in Washington,[54] Mr. Spaak said that he had been attempting to find a formula to overcome the difficulties raised by the French Government's attitude. He was anxious to avoid a situation in which France, by reason of its refusal to accept United States nuclear warheads on French soil, would be excluded from the countries which would acquire Polaris missiles. He had suggested to Messr. Dillon and Gates and to the United States military authorities that it might be possible to reach a compromise whereby European countries other than France, would receive what he termed as "NATO Polaris missiles" and France by special arrangement would acquire some of the same weapons without nuclear warheads. In reply to the Prime Minister's question, Mr. Spaak said he did not know whether France would be willing to accept such an arrangement. Nor did he know whether he had convinced United States authorities of its feasibility. He had, however, been given an assurance that it would be seriously considered.

Mr. Spaak emphasized the urgency of reaching a NATO decision on the Gates proposals. He had been told in Washington that the United States authorities wished for production reasons to have a decision by September 1, 1960. He told the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearkes in reply to their questions that he had so far refrained from placing the Gates proposals on the Council's agenda because he was quite certain that as soon as the discussion started, the difficulties over French policy would immediately expose the impossibility of reaching agreement. He had been searching informally for a compromise which would meet the French position and permit a decision to be taken by the Council.

NATO Consultation

Mr. Spaak deplored the tendency toward a three-power directorate, which had most recently been manifested in the communiqué issued by the Foreign Ministers of the U.S., U.K. and France at the time of the last SEATO meeting. He had spoken to the United States authorities of his concern and they had acknowledged that the communiqué had perhaps been a mistake. Mr. Spaak thought that President de Gaulle had made considerable progress in achieving a special position of equality in consultation with the United Kingdom and the United States. He thought it most unwise of the United States to have allowed this situation to develop. It was having a very bad political effect among the smaller NATO countries. Moreover, the failure of the three powers to reach agreement among themselves, e.g. on disarmament, proved in his opinion the futility of a so-called directorate.

[54] Voir/See Foreign Relations of the United States 1958-1960, Volume VII (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1993), documents 258, 259.

At the Prime Minister's request, Mr. Spaak reviewed the progress in NATO consultation since the time of the report of the Committee of Three in 1956.[55] Mr. Spaak said that the machinery for consultation was adequate; the weakness lay with member governments and particularly with the major powers. There had been good and bad periods in recent months. The pre-Summit discussions had been unusually good. Examples of the failure of consultation were, however, more frequent. He gave as examples the three-power announcement that the March 16 proposals on disarmament would remain the basis of Western policy in the resumed Geneva negotiations,[56] and the failure of the three powers to inform other NATO countries of the receipt on May 8 of a Soviet note addressed to the French Government on the subject of Berlin. Mr. Léger recalled the explanation given by the French Representative in the NATO Council on June 15 (NATO Paris Telegram No. 1632). Mr. Léger said that the Soviet proposal had been communicated informally by the French to the United States[57] and the United Kingdom and Mr. Spaak agreed with the Prime Minister that the explanation given by the French was a poor justification of a failure to consult.

Mr. Spaak returned to the point which he had made in an earlier meeting with Mr. Green that the problem of consultation applied not only to the three powers but equally to the Western Five in the Geneva disarmament talks. The weekly report which the Council received from the Western Five was an agreed report which fell far short of adequately reflecting the conflicting currents of opinion among the Five in Geneva. As a result the discussions on disarmament in the NATO Council had been of very limited value. There had, for instance, been no serious discussion of the latest Soviet proposals. Mr. Spaak thought that since there were evidently important differences between the United States and France with regard to the Soviet proposals, it was extremely important that the NATO Council should discuss the matter.

In the meeting in his office after lunch, Mr. Green expressed sympathy with Mr. Spaak's point of view and there was discussion of the procedure which might be employed to initiate a substantive examination of the current disarmament problem in the NATO Council. Mr. Green enquired whether Mr. Spaak, as Chairman of the Council, would consider calling upon the Western Five to cooperate in a serious discussion of disarmament. Mr. Spaak replied that he was tempted to do this but that he would like to be sure that member countries would clearly state their positions and not take refuge in evasive general statements. Mr. Léger suggested that perhaps the most effective means of getting such a discussion started would be for Mr. Spaak to ask a series of questions to which member governments might reply after consideration.

Future of NATO

In reply to Mr. Fleming's questions Mr. Spaak listed the major problems which were causing him concern at this stage in NATO affairs:

(a) the differences within the Alliance on disarmament policy;

(b) the difficulties of reaching agreement on how to deal with the Gates proposals;

(c) the current weakness in the diplomatic position of the United States;

(d) the trend towards neutrality among the smaller NATO countries.

When the Prime Minister referred to the need for a study of the next ten years in NATO, Mr. Spaak said that he intended to make a statement shortly in the Council and had in mind that the subject should be discussed at the December Ministerial Meeting. He pointed, however, to the difficulties of sketching a long-term plan at a time when the Alliance lacked a common policy both on atomic matters and on disarmament.

Mr. Robertson drew attention to the link between the Western position on disarmament and the atomic policy of NATO. His personal preference was for a deferment of a NATO decision on the Polaris. This would admittedly involve a risk in terms of defence capacity but he thought it was a risk which had to be taken if the West seriously wanted an agreement on disarmament. The basic military doctrine on which NATO defence policy was founded had been enunciated as much [as] six years ago at a time when the balance of power in both atomic and conventional weapons had been significantly different from today. He thought that the addition of the Polaris might further disturb the atomic equilibrium between East and West. He wondered, moreover, whether the West should consider a reversal of its policy hitherto, by making a declaration of its intention not to be the first to use nuclear weapons.

Mr. Spaak agreed that the Polaris, if adopted and installed in NATO countries, would constitute a significant accretion to NATO defence capability. He emphasized that he considered its introduction to be essential.

Disarmament

Mr. Spaak several times expressed his concern over the readiness with which some Western governments, including Canada, were responding to the proposals for nuclear disarmament in the first stage of the latest Soviet plan. He thought it unquestionable that the Soviet Union in advancing its latest proposals was persevering in its long standing attempt to bring about the elimination of United States bases in Europe and the consequent withdrawal of United States troops. With this objective in view the Soviet Government had introduced a number of elements, some of which were designed to appeal to the Western side and others to drive a wedge between individual Western governments. He could not see what the West had to gain from nuclear disarmament in an early stage. The terms which the West could offer for nuclear disarmament would certainly be of no interest to the Russians, and the priority which Canada and France appeared to be willing to give to atomic disarmament was dangerously inconsistent with the plans being considered for the strengthening of NATO defences. He favoured a much greater concentration on eliciting a clearer idea of how far the Soviet Government was prepared to go on the issue of control. In the meantime he could see no objection to the West's offering to discuss such limited measures as "open skies" or zones of inspection. Asked for his ideas on how the disarmament talks in Geneva might be more effectively managed, Mr. Spaak suggested the establishment of two-sub-committees — one to consider the Soviet plan and the other the Western — the two to be merged at a later stage with a view to determining possible areas of agreement.

Mr. Green said that the Western and particularly the Canadian position in the General Assembly would be indefensible unless it contained some significant advances on the original Western plan of March 16. Emphasis on control would be equally bad from the point of view of Assembly tactics. Mr. Green emphasized, however, that the Canadian Government was seriously concerned not merely with propaganda objectives but with the achievement of real progress towards disarmament. In reply to Mr. Spaak's question as to the conditions on which Canada would be prepared to enter a disarmament agreement, Mr. Green said that the Canadian Government sought an agreement on as wide a basis as possible. He was not prepared to dismiss the latest Soviet proposals simply because they contained some unacceptable elements. The prospects for disarmament could be fully explored only through serious negotiation with Soviet representatives. If the negotiations failed, the Western side would at least have demonstrated its good faith and as a result be in a better position to defend itself in the General Assembly. Mr. Green indicated that he was attracted by Mr. Spaak's suggestion for sub-committees in Geneva although he feared that the Western side might be accused of delaying tactics if it were to propose such a suggestion.

Canadian Forces in Europe

Mr. Pearkes said that questions were being raised in Canada as to the real necessity for the maintenance of Canadian air and ground forces in Europe. He wondered what the Secretary-General's reply to such questions would be, bearing in mind the relative military contributions of other NATO countries. Mr. Spaak said that both militarily and politically he regarded the presence of Canadian forces in Europe as "absolutely essential." It was true that the nature of the Soviet threat was changing and that as time went on NATO would be bound to concern itself increasingly with countering Soviet pressures in, for instance, the economic field. It was also possible that with the acquisition of such weapons as the Polaris, the nature of NATO military requirements might alter over the next three years but there was no ground in present circumstances for a change in the composition of NATO ground and air forces in Europe.

During a discussion at lunch on the projected employment of the Polaris missile, Mr. Pearkes said that if one year ago the Canadian Government had known of the Polaris, it might have seriously considered acquiring it instead of adopting the F-104. Mr. Miller noted that while the Polaris was intended for use against fixed targets, it was not considered to be as effective against "fleeting" targets such as moving vehicles, troop concentrations, etc. Hence the continuing need for aircraft in a strike role.

NATO Heads of Government Meeting

The only discussion of a possible Heads of Government meeting took place at lunch. The Prime Minister explained to Mr. Spaak that in advancing this idea recently he had not intended to suggest that such a meeting should be held in the immediate future. He was convinced of the importance of full preparation particularly in connection with the study of NATO's future. He thought that once the necessary preparations and studies had been completed, it would then be useful to convene a meeting at Heads of Government level. Mr. Spaak indicated general agreement with the Prime Minister's remarks but said that he did not expect that it would be possible to contemplate such a meeting until perhaps the spring of 1961.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 14, 1960

Dear Doug [Dillon],

Yesterday I spoke to you about the negotiations now taking place on cost sharing for NATO infrastructure. The Canadian position is as follows.

In the first NATO infrastructure programme (1950) the United States took a large share of the load: 48.1%. Canada, at 4.43%, bore a share roughly comparable with the United States, in terms of population, but quite high in terms of national income. (In terms of national income, other countries bore a somewhat heavier share: e.g. France, 21.52% and U.K. 17.72%, but of course they reaped economic benefits from the expenditure.)

Since then, Germany has come in as a contributor (and beneficiary) and certain weaker European countries, which were originally left out of the cost sharing arrangement, have become contributors. The United States has insisted, from time to time, that its proportion was too high. As a result of these developments the United States now pays only 36.98%. Canada, at 6.15%, is far too high, both in relation to the U.S.A., and also in relation to other (beneficiary) countries including U.K. (9.88%), France (11.87%) and Germany (13.72%).

About a year ago the U.S. warned that they wished to reduce their share still further. Since that time Canada has given repeated warnings, both to the Infrastructure Committee and to the U.S. directly that, if the U.S. share came down, the Canadian share would have to come down pari passu. These warnings have gone unheeded.

The U.S. has been proposing that their share should be reduced from the present 36.98% to 25%; more recent proposals, made in NATO Council yesterday (December 13), are that the U.S. should come down to 29.48%, with Canada's share remaining unchanged at 6.15%. From Canada's point of view, any such proposal is completely unreasonable and unacceptable.

This point is emphasized by reviewing the trends between the 1950 scale and the present scale. Since that time the proportionate burden of U.K. and France have both fallen by about 45%. That of the U.S. has fallen by 23%. That of Canada has risen by 39%. It was proposed yesterday in the NATO Council that there should be a slight increase in the burdens of U.K. and France and that the burden of U.S. should be reduced to 45% (instead of the 48% requested by U.S.A.) below 1950, but that Canada's share should be left unchanged. Such an arrangement could not possibly be explained or defended in Canada.

Canada would have been willing to allow the present arrangement, unfair though it is to Canada, to continue. But if the United States proportion is to come down Canada's proportion must come down pari passu.

Yours sincerely,
DONALD M. FLEMING

NATO INFRASTRUCTURE COST-SHARING

Please transmit following message at 9.00 a.m. Ottawa time to Honourable Donald Fleming.

1. Contrary to our expectations Spaak proposed in Council yesterday that a meeting of Finance Ministers should be held this a.m. in a final effort to resolve infrastructure impasse. Since Lloyd and you were not repeat not here Spaak's proposals was finally abandoned. Lord Home approached me after the meeting. He indicated that a great deal of effort had been made behind the scenes to reach some acceptable formula which would meet not repeat not only USA desire for reduction but our own. Final agreement he thought might be reached if Canada were willing to move from strict adherence to pari passu relationship in Cda-USA reductions.

2. Subsequently Steele attended a dinner for Finance Ministers at which the subject was pursued further. Canada was approached with following new proposals which so far as we can be certain command the support of other delegations. In essence these proposals by Secretariat indicate that American share would now be reduced only to 30 percent rather than 29 percent as originally proposed. Canada would have its share reduced to 5.15 and the only other reduction would be that for Belgium of .15. In this proposal seven other countries would share offsetting increases, the largest being German increase of 6.28 which would bring their share to 20 percent. There are increases for Norway .18, Italy .36, Denmark .24, France .13, Netherlands .32, UK .62. This new proposal comes very close to pari passu reduction which we have been seeking with the Americans in re-arrangement of infrastructure sharing. Your officials believe this may be the best compromise arrangement which we will be able to reach and I would hope that you could give us your instructions today.

3. I propose to have Steele call you at 9.30 a.m. Ottawa time.

INFRASTRUCTURE REQUIREMENTS 1961-64

At last meeting of Council before Christmas break this a.m. December 20, draft decision concerning size of infrastructure programme for next four years was considered. Text is set out in document RDC/60/429 which with minor revisions is same text as that forwarded in our telegram 3340 December 15.†

2. [I]t might be useful for your records to set out very briefly the course of developments over the past ten days. Press of meetings and preparations for Ministerial Session made it impossible for us to give you a day-by-day account. In the three or four days just preceding arrival of ministers, permanent representatives met in private for something over twenty hours to haggle over the size of infrastructure programme and cost-sharing arrangements. Every effort was made, especially by USA delegate, to find a basis for agreement on both scores which would avoid necessity of referring the matter to ministers. After their arrival ministers themselves were involved in informal discussions on this subject. Mr. Fleming e.g. discussed it with both Dillon and Anderson and set out Canadian position in a letter to Dillon. As a result of the rather hectic meetings of Council in private session and of endless meetings in smaller groups, it seemed that an agreement was in sight on cost-sharing formula and that text in RDC/60/429 covering size of the programme would also be acceptable. As you are aware, we were given authority as the result of a phone conversation with Mr. Fleming to accept a Canadian share of 5.15 percent and to agree to text on size of the programmable. At this point, which was on Saturday afternoon December 17, cost-sharing package became tied and untied, it seemed about once every hour. The main difficulty was with Turks who demanded that their share be reduced from 1.75 percent to 1 percent. We understand that by late Saturday night they were bargaining coldly their willingness to stay at 1.75 percent against acceptance by Council of their resolution on aid to less-developed member countries. This was the situation when subject came up late in Ministerial Session on Sunday afternoon. Turkish resolution with respect to aid to less-developed member countries was accepted (our telegram 3362 December 18).† Then to the horror of International Staff Turks welshed on their bargain and refused to stick at 1.75 percent. At this point Greek Foreign Minister intervened to indicate that if Turkey achieved a reduction it would be politically essential for Greece also to have its share reduced. In the circumstances, there was no repeat no alternative but to pass cost-sharing problem back to Council. It seemed that agreement however still existed on text with respect to size of the programme.

3. There was a tendency at Council this a.m. to give formal approval therefore to RDC/60/429 with minor textual amendments, details of which are included in a following telegram. Intervention of German representative however cast some doubts of even this possibility. He was under instructions to get agreement to a change in paragraph 5 which would have the effect of Council agreeing with German interpretation of how savings might be brought forward from earlier slices whereas at the moment Council simply takes note of German delegates understanding on this point. This intervention brought immediate protests from Belgian, UK, Norwegian, USA and Canadian delegates, all of whom argued essentially that their authorities were prepared to accept present text barring amendments of substance and that one amendment of substance would necessitate a complete renegotiation. USA representative said that his authorities were prepared to accept German interpretation of protest which would be used to bring savings forward but were not repeat not prepared to bind themselves to such an agreement as the new German wording would involve. Secretary-General finally proposed adoption of text as amended, with a German reservation. If this reservation is not repeat not lifted, Council will take the matter up again at its next meeting January 11. Amendments are those referred to above, to be included in a following telegram.

4. French representative underlined intention of his authorities as set out in paragraph 4(c) of document RDC/60/429; French position he explained was essentially a reservation on any automatic re-programming of savings. We took the opportunity to outline main points contained in your telegram DL-1402 December 16.† We said that while we wished these points to be on the record, we would not repeat not press them if existing text proved to be the only basis upon which full agreement could be reached. Our point of view will appear in Council's records.

5. Very brief attention was given to question of cost-sharing. USA representative thanked both Secretariat and all delegates for the very real efforts which had been made to find an acceptable cost-sharing formula. He thought that real progress had been made and that a final solution could be found. It was decided that international staff should continue its efforts to find a solution for presentation to Council early in new year.

[Ottawa], December 27, 1960

Dear François [Houde]:

As you know I had planned to do a report for the information of officials concerned with infrastructure here in Ottawa on the discussions concerning the future NATO Infrastructure Porgramme at the Ministerial Meeting. In the meantime, however, a fairly detailed report has come through from the Delegation in telegram 3374 of December 20. There is, therefore, no need for me to duplicate this report. There are, however, a few additional points of interest which it might be useful for me to set out for the record.

First of all, I noticed from the telegrams which have come back to Ottawa on this subject that nowhere has there been a complete statement on the compromise cost-sharing formula proposed by the International Staff. For your information I have attached at Annex, a table showing the current formula, the changes proposed and the resulting compromise.† It should be noted that, from information we received in Paris from the Dutch Delegation, it appears the four smaller European countries which pick up increases in this compromise may wish to re-adjust the distribution of increases among themselves. This will be a matter affecting only these four countries, however, and will not have any bearing on the acceptance of the formula by other countries.

I have also attached a copy of the letter sent by Mr. Fleming to Mr. Dillon on December 14, setting out the firm Canadian position with respect to Canadian share of the future infrastructure programme.

Another point of some interest was the discussion which Mr. Steele and I had with Ralph Churchill concerning the background of the draft resolution on the size of the future programme. You will recall that certain comments on this resolution were forwarded to the Delegation in telegram DL-1402 of December 16th.† The resolution was the result of many hours of negotiations by permanent representatives and the infrastructure advisors of the various delegations and represents a delicately balanced compromise in which practically every sentence is of the utmost importance at least to one delegation. There are therefore good reasons for the Delegation's acceptance of the paragraphs questioned in telegram DL-1402. In this regard, the following comments were made by Ralph Churchill and seemed to me to be valid.

(1) With respect to paragraph 3 of the resolution the wording here is identical to a similar paragraph included in the agreement on the cost-sharing for Slices VIII – XI. The phrase questioned by DL-1402 applies to the Special Committee agreements.

(2) The French position noted in paragraph 4 (a) will indeed have the effect of requiring the Military authorities to re-examine Slice XII. At the Council Session on Saturday, December 16 Mr. Spaak pointed this out and there were no objections from either delegations or military authorities to this statement. It should be kept in mind that with the very difficult line taken by the French on the air defence ground environment project, Slice XII is effectively reduced to less than £60 million already.

(3) The position taken by Germany on savings is, I agree, neither administratively desirable nor from Canada's point of view financially advantageous. However, here again this represents a balance of compromise between the U.S. and Germany. The U.S. has pointed out that it is willing to accept the German position. By their acceptance they in effect add several percentage points to their future infrastructure contribution. Since Germany and the U.S. will between them pick up 50% of the future programme it would not seem reasonable to urge this point further.

(4) Finally, with regard to the last paragraph of the resolution it appeared to Churchill that this paragraph adds nothing to the resolution since it can be interpreted in several ways. This position is apparently shared by the U.K. Delegation but since the U.S. Delegation was under firm instructions to press for its inclusion it seemed reasonable to accept it. Certainly the U.K. Delegation does not consider that the inclusion of this paragraph prevents an attempt at a later date to include any necessary MRBM facilities within the £250 million programme.

It appears that the resolution will now be accepted as drafted. Should this become impossible I would agree that some of our amendments should be pursued. If however the compromise is accepted by other countries I consider that we should not push our amendments any further.

Finally, you may be interested in the fact that the press representatives in Paris obviously received a great deal of information about infrastructure negotiations since on several occasions Mr. Green was asked searching questions on this subject at his press conferences. In answer to these questions Mr. Green pointed out that Canada considered the arguments used by the U.S. to be equally applicable in our case and that we were requesting a reduction in our percentage as well. As far as I have been able to ascertain this reply has not found its way into the press but I cannot be certain on this point. I gather Mr. Green intends, if asked in the House about this subject, to make a reply at that time along similar lines to those used in reply to press questions.

Yours very truly,

J.A. MACPHERSON

TELEGRAM 120 Paris, January 19, 1961

CONFIDENTIAL. PRIORITY.

Repeat DM/Finance, DM/DND, CCOS (Priority) from Ottawa, Washington, London, Bonn (Information).

INFRASTRUCTURE REQUIREMENTS 1961/64

The Secretary-General has addressed a letter to all permanent representatives enclosing a proposed infrastructure cost sharing formula for Slices XII to XV. The Secretary-General proposes that "Council agree:

(a) that the cost-sharing for Slices XII to XV will be as follows:

Country	Percent
Belgium	4.24
Canada	5.15
Denmark	2.87
France	12.00
Germany	20.00
Greece	0.67
Italy	5.97
Luxembourg	0.17
Netherlands	3.83
Norway	2.37
Portugal	0.28
Turkey	1.10
UK	10.50
USA	30.85
	100.00 percent

(b) that where savings and/or contingencies from Slices II through XI are used for the re-programming of projects deleted from these slices, or for the programming of new projects, such savings and/or contingencies shall be cost-shared according to the formula of the programme from which they have been derived;

(c) that these suggestions refer only to the infrastructure programme for Slices XII to XV and the expenditures which it was agreed by the Council should be financed according to this formula, and in no repeat no way imply a new cost-sharing formula with regard to other fields of common financing, either at present or for the future."

2. This new proposal differs from the formula which was almost accepted during the Ministerial Meeting by a proposed reduction for Turkey from 1.75 percent to 1.10 percent and by a proposed reduction for Greece from .87 percent to .67 percent offset by an increase in the proposed USA contribution from 30 percent to 30.85 percent. We understand from the infrastructure adviser in the USA delegation that the Secretary-General's proposal is being recommended to Washington and it is felt that this formula can be accepted by USA if, as appears likely, it can be accepted by other members.

3. If the USA accepts the new proposed figure of 30.85 percent this will represent a reduction of 16.576 percent on the cost-sharing formula which covers Slices VIII to XI where USA share was 36.98 percent. If the same percentage reduction is applied to our contribution of 6.15 percent our share should be 5.13 percent. In other words the proposed increase for the USA means that the 5.15 percent for Canada is extremely close to the one to six ratio which was our objective.

4. We are asked by the Secretary-General in his letter to confirm that the new formula is acceptable and we would appreciate your confirmation on this point as soon as possible.[58]

SECRET AND PERSONAL Paris, February 19, 1960

Dear Norman [Robertson]:

Last Saturday SACEUR's presentation of the MC 70 country study on Canada was made to Mr. Pearkes. I attach for your information a copy of a memorandum prepared in the Delegation covering that presentation in part. The "facts and figures" making up the presentation are contained in a bulky document which was given to us after the oral presentation. A copy will be coming to you under separate cover.† I believe that this letter and its attachment, as well as the SHAPE document, should be treated with a great deal of discretion in the Department. The presentation was solely for the benefit of the Minister of National Defence and it will be his responsibility to make a direct reply to the Supreme Commander. The only involvement of this Delegation in the presentation was that of an interested observer. We were not encouraged to take soundings before the event nor to report officially on the presentation.

Perhaps Charles has already spoken to you about the presentation. I felt, however, that I should send you this memorandum so that you would be aware of what transpired. I believe complete responsibility, however, rests with Mr. Pearkes to inform his colleagues of the presentation and that any intervention by our Department at this stage would be unwise.

I thought that the whole exercise was most unfortunate; neither of the parties to the presentation could have been satisfied. Mr. Pearkes and General Foulkes expressed their dissatisfaction in no uncertain terms. I am sure that General Norstad's purpose in making these presentations is to convince the individual countries concerned of the necessity for solid commitments to meet the planning objectives set in MC 70. I would say that he failed insofar as the Canadian presentation is concerned. He did explain a number of times during the presentation that it was based on a format used for all countries which was not particularly appropriate for Canada and the United States. It was not, however, only the format which was unfortunate. There was a lack of appreciation of the climate of political opinion in Canada and, even to a layman, the arithmetic of the presentation seemed shaky.

[58] La formule a été acceptée par le Canada.
The formula was accepted by Canada.

We were given to understand that the five other presentations which had been made prior to our own had been successful. I cannot confirm this appreciation from personal knowledge but I suspect that one of the successful features of the other presentations would be that section of the presentation setting out a need (and a hard figure) for external aid. Certain countries might well be willing to accept a certain amount of shaky arithmetic when the study contained an outsider's appraisal (i.e. the Supreme Commander's) of a need for foreign aid. Such a figure might well prove very useful in the dealings of individual countries concerned with Washington.

It is too early to estimate what effect these country studies when completed will have. Certainly they represent an attempt by the Supreme Commander to transform planning objectives into firmer commitments by governments. This in itself is a laudable objective viewed from here. Too vigorous an attempt in this direction however, without due regard to the political and economic realities in individual countries, may be self-defeating. Bearing in mind Mr. Pearkes' immediate reactions to the presentation, I hope the Canadian Government will not feel it necessary in the near future to make any public statements concerning its desire for a reduction in the brigade and the eventual withdrawal of four RCAF squadrons. An announcement of that kind in the near future would, I think, be most damaging to the general Western negotiating position at the summit and at the way-stations to the summit.

My understanding is that the Minister of National Defence will send his written comments on the country study to the Supreme Commander and that a paper including the Canadian comments will then go to the Standing Group and the Military Committee for study, followed finally by a paper prepared for the Council. Whatever procedure is followed there should be adequate opportunity for the expression of Canadian views. In the circumstances, therefore, I believe the document presented by the Supreme Commander is very much of a first effort and should not be thought of as having much status. It is for that reason that I believe it should be treated with a good deal of discretion within the Department. The final product, if it ever is presented, may well be very different.

I would be very much interested to know, in general terms at least, what Mr. Pearkes said to Cabinet about the presentation.[59] I would hope too that in any further steps taken in this matter of a country study the Delegation could be kept fully informed. Such information along the way will be the more important if at some stage some version of the country study is to be used during the Annual Review exercise and possibly come before Council for its consideration. I have given a copy of the attached memorandum to Captain Dickinson for transmission to Charles Foulkes.

Yours sincerely,

JULES LÉGER

Memorandum from Delegation to North Atlantic Council to Permanent Representative to North Atlantic Council

SECRET [Paris], February 15, 1960

MC 70 COUNTRY STUDY — PRESENTATION BY SACEUR, FEBRUARY 15

SACEUR's presentation of the MC 70 country study on Canada was made to the Minister of National Defence at SHAPE Headquarters on February 15. Complete documentation on the presentation was given to us after the meeting (Document AG-1240/M&R-11/60 PROG). There is no use in attempting to summarize what we have in such complete form. The purpose of this memorandum is therefore to summarize the important points made by Mr. Pearkes and General Foulkes in the course of the presentation.

2, It was explained that the purpose of the country study was twofold:

(a) To acquaint all concerned with the nature and magnitude of the problems involved in implementing the quantitative requirements of MC 70 and the qualitative requirements of MC 55/1;

(b) to provide a reasonable basis on which to develop practical methods and procedures for meeting MC 70 goals and standards and for ensuring the best use of resources which are or may become available.

3. General Norstad pointed out several times in the course of the briefing that the format of the presentation was not particularly applicable for a country like Canada. For example, one of the important features of the presentation with the majority of the NATO members was an examination of the amount of external aid required by the individual country to assist in meeting MC 70 force goals. He emphasized as well that the study was not intended to be regarded as recommendations for actions by the governments concerned. The study was intended merely to outline, on the basis of the information available to SHAPE, the size and nature of the gap which existed between country efforts and MC 70 force goals.

4. At the outset of the briefing General Foulkes emphasized Canadian dissatisfaction with developments arising out of MC 70. MC 70 had been approved for planning purposes only. Yet each year recommendations were made by SACEUR for forces to meet MC 70 requirements and failure by a government to meet these recommendations was then listed as a shortfall for that particular country. In the Canadian view a requirement was not a requirement until it was accepted by the Canadian Government. It made no sense to list as a shortfall something which had never been accepted as a requirement by a particular government.

5. General Norstad admitted that MC 70 had been accepted only for planning purposes. For the first time, however, with the drawing up of MC 70, firm planning objectives for the Alliance had been established instead of the "blue skies" goals which had existed prior to MC 70. MC 70 therefore had some validity even if it was not accepted in detail by individual governments. It was essential to have some such yardstick. Every effort should be made to get from governments commitments to meet as many of the planning goals set in MC 70 as possible. Otherwise NATO planning would be chaotic, if not non-existent.

6. One section of the presentation was concerned with the required increase in Canadian military personnel for the period 1960-1964 to meet MC 70 requirements. An increase of 4710 army personnel was required of which some 3900 would be non-organic support personnel. Mr. Pearkes at this point said he was disappointed that such a presentation should be made by the Supreme Commander. In the light of the grave emergency which existed at the time of the formation of NATO, Canada had made a maximum contribution of ground troops to Europe. It was Canada's expectation that, in due course, their contribution could be reduced when the European members of the Alliance were able to shoulder their full responsibilities. Now, 10 years later, any thought of an increase in the Canadian brigade was impossible to contemplate. He had come to this presentation with the hope, and indeed, the expectation, that the Supreme Commander would be able to indicate that the Canadian brigade could be decreased in strength by as much as one-third. He wished there to be no misunderstanding on the part of the Supreme Commander; not one additional Canadian soldier would be coming to Europe to meet this so-called gap in support personnel. If support personnel were lacking in the division, surely the Supreme Commander should be seeking additional personnel from the United Kingdom, which bore responsibility for support personnel. Mr. Pearkes went on to say that the provision of the brigade seemed to the Canadian Government a most uneconomical and indeed, extravagant method by which Canada could make an effective contribution to the Alliance. Because of the fact that Canadian forces were recruited on a voluntary basis, it was essential to make provision in Europe for dependents, schools, etc., all of which added to their maintenance costs. Mr. Pearkes reiterated his argument on this latter point at another stage in the presentation when it was revealed that the per capita cost of maintaining Canadian military personnel were the highest in the Alliance.

7. At that point in the presentation dealing with the increase of personnel for the Air Force, Mr. Pearkes told the Supreme Commander that the Canadian Government had assumed that upon the completion of the re-equipment of the eight RCAF squadrons in Europe with F104 aircraft, the other four AWX squadrons would be withdrawn. He said as well that so far as the Canadian Government was concerned, SACEUR's recommendation for an additional aircraft carrier from Canada was a non-starter. On several occasions in that part of the presentation concerning the increase of personnel costs, General Foulkes challenged the basis of SHAPE calculations. Further, he expressed the belief that costing operations of this sort were not the proper function of a military headquarters. SHAPE's arithmetic was not impressive even to a layman.

8. The next major intervention in the discussion by Mr. Pearkes came when it was suggested that over the next five years Canadian national defence expenditures might increase by some $747 million over the 1959 level. The arithmetic of this is all set out in the brief which was provided to us. Mr. Pearkes emphasized that SHAPE could have no grounds for any expectation of an increase in Canadian national defence expenditures over the next few years. Indeed, drastic cuts in defence expenditures were foreseen by the Canadian Government. In addition to the fact that defence expenditures were likely to be cut, the balance of expenditures by the Canadian Government was likely to change. It was the Canadian Government's belief that there was a declining threat posed by the Russians to Western Europe but an increased threat to North America. The Russians could only win a global war in North America. In these circumstances, it was only common sense that the amounts spent for defence purposes (out of a reduced defence budget) would increase for forces in North America and decrease for forces in Western Europe.

9. General Foulkes raised another point of substance in connection with the recommended build-up to 60 days ammunition supply for Canadian forces. He argued that he had challenged this build-up in the Military Committee and asked whether or not views put forward in that Committee had any effect on planning at SHAPE. General Norstad said that although both the Canadian and UK Representatives had entered reservations on this point in the Military Committee, MC 55/1 had not been modified and this had to be his guiding document. He went on to say that he did not agree entirely with everything in MC 55/1 but felt that he must be guided by the letter and the spirit of that document until it was formally modified. General

Foulkes commented that such a statement put him in an awkward position. Surely he could not be expected to recommend to the Canadian Government on military grounds requirements arising out of a document which the Supreme Commander himself was unwilling to support in every detail.

10. At the conclusion of the presentation Mr. Pearkes again emphasized the hope of the Canadian Government that it would be possible for SACEUR to recommend a reduction in both the Canadian brigade and the air division. The Canadian Government was clearly on the record in its support of NATO; there could be no doubt of this. Our brigade then was not required as a token of good faith. As a military unit it seemed to make little economic sense. This one brigade could not seriously affect the military posture of the Alliance and yet it was costing the Canadian Government a good deal more than a similar unit employed in Canada in the interests of the Alliance. General Norstad said that from the military standpoint it was most unlikely that the requirement for military forces in Europe could be reduced. Only if by a political means the free world could be given as much security as NATO forces had provided over the past ten years, could any reduction be contemplated. He had reduced forces substantially from the fuzzy standards which had been in vogue prior to the writing of MC 70. He could not reduce them further until the mission assigned to him had been changed as a result of achievements in the political field resulting in a decreased threat to the security of Western Europe. At this stage there was no such decrease nor did it seem likely that the threat would be decreased in the foreseeable future.

11. Finally, General Norstad said he wished the Minister to be in no doubt as to his, SACEUR's, real interest in maintaining the Canadian brigade and the Canadian air division in Europe.

12. It was agreed that further discussion between SACEUR and the Minister on the points raised in the course of the presentation would be continued in private.

COMMENTS ON SACEUR'S COUNTRY STUDY ON CANADA

Mr. Bryce spoke to Mr. Pearkes this afternoon on this matter and was told that the session with General Norstad had turned out to be quite sticky. In the light of the statements in the draft country study Mr. Pearkes had felt it necessary to express fairly definite Canadian views and reservations. Mr. Pearkes indicated to Mr. Bryce that he plans to report on this situation to Cabinet within the next ten days.[60] At that time he will ask Cabinet to confirm the views which he expressed to General Norstad, or at least to reach agreement on other views that can be communicated to General Norstad.

[60] Voir le document précédent, note 59./See the previous document, footnote 59.

2. In line with a suggestion which I had made earlier, Mr. Bryce agreed that it would be very useful if, in the interval, you could arrange for a brief informal talk on this whole subject with General Foulkes and Mr. Bryce.

SHAPE MC 70 COUNTRY STUDY ON REQUIREMENTS — CANADA

1. In December 1956 the North Atlantic Council issued a Political Directive to the NATO military authorities and directed that a review of NATO defence planning be made in order to determine how, within the resources likely to be made available, the defence effort of the Alliance and of each individual member country could best achieve the most effective pattern of forces. From this review recommendations were made to Council, covering the minimum forces considered essential to implement the approved Strategic Concept of NATO. In May 1958, the North Atlantic Council approved for planning purposes "The Minimum Essential Force Requirements 1958-1963" (MC 70), subject to periodic reviews and accepted the country breakdowns set out in document MC 70 as guidance for the 1958 Annual Review. At that time it was pointed out to Council by the Minister of National Defence that acceptance of the country breakdowns as guidance for the Annual Review did not indicate that the Canadian Government was prepared to accept all the recommendations regarding additional or re-equipped forces to be supplied by Canada.

2. The "Resolution on Defence" of the North Atlantic Council at the Ministerial meetings in December 1958 invited the Secretary-General, in agreement with member governments and, if necessary, through visits to NATO capitals, to follow up the problems involved for each NATO country in the implementation of the recommendations put forward by the military authorities and the International Staff in MC 70 during the 1958 Annual Review. As a result of this resolution, the Secretary-General had discussions with the Supreme Commanders and Standing Group and he reported to Council in March 1959 that the military authorities would have to undertake a considerable amount of the preparatory work on how to close the gap between national defence plans and MC 70 requirements. In addition the resolution of the 1959 Annual Review adopted at last December's Ministerial meting noted that the planning goals indicated by the member countries in their replies to the 1959 Questionnaire frequently fell short of the minimum forces requested by the NATO military authorities (MC 70), and recorded the agreement of the Council that the overall evaluation of the results of the military studies should be completed and forwarded to the NATO Council not later than 1 May 1960.

3. SACEUR, in consultation with SACLANT and the International Staff, has now completed the MC 70 Country Study on Requirements for Canada (excluding Mutual Aid or infrastructure contributions) and has reached the following conclusions and recommendations:

"(a) Conclusions

(i) At current national defence expenditures, Canada is not likely to meet her MC 70 force requirements at the standards called for under the agreed "Military Planning Factors" (MC 55/1).

(ii) However, with a reasonable increase over the Fiscal Year 1958/59 level of national defence expenditures, it should be possible to reach the MC 70 force goals at the required standards.

(iii) It is considered that Canada has the economic capacity to make the appropriate increase in her national defence expenditures.

(b) Recommendations

(i) The Canadian authorities should be requested to make the appropriate increase in her current defence effort.

(ii) As resources become available they should be applied to the MC 70 requirements generally in the order and manner proposed by SACEUR."

4. The recommendations of the study would involve acceptance by the Government of Canada of a number of additions and adjustments to our military commitments extending over the next five years. It is estimated in the study that these would require substantial expenditures over and above the rate of expenditure in the current Fiscal Year. As a basis for the costing analysis this study has assumed that prices remain stable.

5. The study calculates that these adjustments and additions to present Canadian commitments could be covered if the Canadian Government increased its defence expenditures, from the level in 1959 which was taken to be $1,794 millions, to the following levels in subsequent years:

1960	$1,884 millions
1961	$1,917 millions
1962	$1,946 millions
1963	$1,970 millions
1964	$2,000 millions

6. The study assumes that if the Canadian Gross National Product continued to increase steadily by 4 per cent per annum the proportion of it that would have to be applied to defence expenditures in order to cover the gap would actually decline; in other words, while defence expenditures over the next five years would rise in the absolute, they would rise rather less rapidly than the assumed increase in the national income.

7. It is recommended that the attached memorandum be approved as the Canadian Government's comments on the MC 70 Country Study and that this memorandum be presented to SACEUR by our Ambassador to NATO.[61]

COMMENTS OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON THE MC 70 COUNTRY STUDY OF CANADA
(AG 1240/MA&R-11/60 PROG DATED 4 JANUARY 60)

1. In nearly all the NATO countries defence expenditures now bulk so large that they involve high political judgments as well as military and economic judgments. The amounts which Canada will devote to defence in each of the coming five years will depend at least as much on political as on military and economic factors. Amongst the many influences at work will, of course, be the progress of disarmament talks, the results of Summit meetings, and similar matters. Accordingly it is scarcely sufficient to attempt to indicate possible levels of defence expenditures on the basis of simple assumptions about the growth of the Gross National Product and the proportions which, under hypothetical conditions, might be devoted to defence. In any case, such considerations, insofar as they are relevant, belong within the flexible and comprehensive framework of the Annual Review under the authority of the supreme North Atlantic authority — the Council.

2. It should be emphasized that Canadian commitments to NATO have always been expressed and conceived in physical terms — certain forces, equipped in certain ways, to be supplied on certain dates — and never in financial terms. (It has been repeatedly emphasized by the Canadian authorities that the means, including the financial means, by which these commitments are fulfilled must remain the responsibility of the Canadian Government.) With these considerations in mind, it is appropriate to comment in some detail, from a military point of view, on SACEUR's proposals.

3. When the Country Study was presented to the Minister of National Defence and the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, SACEUR mentioned that the format was not particularly applicable to a country like Canada. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff agree with this view and consider that there has been omitted from this study an important part of the Canadian defence effort, namely, the Canada-US Regional Planning Group, which includes NORAD and ALCANUS. These defensive arrangements are all part of NATO and therefore any consideration of the Canadian defence effort should include both NORAD and ALCANUS. Additionally, and irrespective of the availability of funds, the Canadian Chiefs of Staff, for the reasons given in the following paragraphs of this memorandum, are not in complete agreement with the suggested additions and adjustments shown in Chart 7, page 54 of the MC 70 Country Study. (See Appendix "A"). It is considered further that the points raised in this study are also the points that have been raised previously in the 1959 Annual Review and these have been answered fully by Canada. The examination of the study has not changed the conclusions which were reached on these questions as given in the Annual Review.

4. In respect to the items included in the study in Chart 7, page 54, (Appendix "A"), the following specific comments are made:

(a) Provision of 8 Strike Reconnaissance Squadrons. The provision of the eight strike reconnaissance squadrons has already been undertaken by the Government. SHAPE has been fully informed, and we have been advised the SHAPE is recommending to the Standing Group that the appendix to MC 70 should be amended to show the eight strike squadrons replacing the present eight day squadrons.

(b) Provision of Additional Escort Vessels. The Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic is well aware of the situation in regard to the provision and replacement of escorts. This was fully discussed with the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic on 3 March 1958, at the time the MC 70 recommendations were under discussions. It should be pointed out that Canada has maintained her naval force goals since the original agreement at the time of the Lisbon meetings in 1952. The reason we do not appear to meet the force goals in MC 70 is that SACLANT has changed the categories of ships and the time the ships are required since Canada accepted her early commitments. In accepting the commitment in 1952, the threat to the west coast was considered to be negligible and therefore, while some of the escort vessels were stationed on the west coast, where adequate facilities exist, it was considered feasible to move some of these ships to the east coast in time to meet our commitments to SACLANT. However the increased threat to the west coast and the changes in categories of the escort vessels create a new problem for Canada. The new conditions of categories require the ships to be immediately available in the area of operations, which means that of the 29 escorts earmarked for deployment on the east coast, four or five will always be in refit. This situation must be accepted if we are to continue to have the ships in a state of repair and modernization to be acceptable for combat. In assessing Canada's contribution to NATO in the maritime field, consideration should be given to the increased requirement for the defence of the west coast. For this purpose fourteen escorts and twelve maritime aircraft have been assigned to the west coast in addition to the 29 escorts and 40 maritime aircraft earmarked for operation on the east coast.

With regard to the obsolescence of thirteen of the present escort vessels, a program for replacing overage ships at the rate of about two per year is now in progress. While the present rate of replacing obsolete ships is not up to what SACLANT would desire, it will still bring the Canadian Navy up to a standard of modernization equal to any of the other NATO partners.

(c) Provision of LACROSSE Battery. As stated in the answers to the Annual Review, it is intended to provide the Brigade with four launchers and the necessary missiles for the support of the Brigade Group. Consideration was being given to the provision of LACROSSE. However, as the United States has now abandoned the developments of the modified LACROSSE missile system, and as improvements have been made to the HONEST JOHN missile, consideration is now being given to the provision of four HONEST JOHN launchers and the improved missile. It is expected that these units will be available in 1961 and 1962. This adjustment is in line with the recommendations of the Supreme Allied Commanders in SHAPE 154/59 of 29 December 1959.

(d) Build-up to 30-Day Reserves (Navy). Provision has already been made to meet this requirement.

(e) Provision of a Helicopter Carrier. The provision of a second carrier has been repeatedly recommended by SACLANT but this recommendation has not been accepted by the Chiefs of Staff or recommended by them to the Canadian Government. SACLANT and the Standing Group have been advised on several occasions that Canada has no intention of accepting this recommendation and this was again pointed out during the briefing in Paris.

(f) Provision of 4 All-Weather Fighter Squadrons to Replace 4 Squadrons of CF100's. Whereas the Canadian Government has taken a decision to replace the eight squadrons of the F86's with F104 Strike/Recce aircraft, no program is contemplated to re-equip or replace the four CF100 All-Weather Fighter Squadrons. The Minister of National Defence made this clear to SACEUR at the time of the presentation of the Canadian Country Study.

(g) Support for the Brigade Group. The recommendation for Canada to provide complete national logistic support for the Brigade Group is not considered feasible. Arrangements were made with the United Kingdom for the peace and wartime support of the Brigade Group on a similar basis as in the last war, whereby Canada would pay a capitation rate both in peace and war, for which the United Kingdom would provide our common user items. While it is realized that the present system appears to have some serious defects in operations, it does not appear to be either logical or economical to provide a complete logistic system from Canada to Europe to maintain a Brigade Group in a short war.

(h) Replacement of 12 Fighter Aircraft on Carrier. This item recommends replacement of twelve Banshee fighters in 1962. This recommendation is considered unrealistic in that the Bonaventure is not suitable for the operation of fighter aircraft of markedly higher performance than the Banshee. However, anti-aircraft defence by some other means is constantly under review.

(j) Modernization of M-Day Units. This recommendation appears to arise from a hypothetical proposal for modernizing equipment of the Brigade and does not take into consideration the modernization program which has been in effect since the Brigade has been in Europe. It should be pointed out that this Brigade Group is being kept equipped with the most modern equipment available and this situation is reflected in SACEUR's effectiveness reports.

(k) Raising the Manning Level of M-Day Forces (ARMY). The question of the deficiencies in manning has been fully explained in the answers to the Annual Review. As has been stated on previous occasions, the establishments for the units of the Brigade Group have been left on the basis of last war establishments pending the NATO study on the shape and size of ground forces for operations in Allied Command Europe. This study has been completed and therefore the establishments of the Brigade Group will be adjusted so that the units will be at one hundred per cent strength instead of the present eighty-five per cent. However it is not intended to increase the overall size of the Brigade Group.

(l) Building up of 60/90 Days' Ammunition (RCAF). The recommendations to build up to 60 and then to 90 days' ammunition reserves for the RCAF are not acceptable to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and appear to have ignored the proviso which was placed in MC 55/1 regarding the provision of operational stocks beyond thirty days. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff do not agree in principle to the provision of more than thirty-day stocks until all the requirements for M-Day forces have been met. Further there are some doubts about the wisdom of expending funds on the building up of sixty and then to ninety days' ammunition reserves when no reserves of aircraft are planned, and therefore combat attrition will likely seriously reduce the size of the Air Division after the first few days of intensive operations.

MC 70 COUNTRY STUDY ON CANADA

There is included below the text of a letter dated July 20 to me from General Norstad concerning the MC 70 country study for Canada.

2. It strikes me that the two points of substance in the letter are (a) SACEUR's statement that contemplated Canadian government action with respect to the four CF-100 all-weather squadrons was not repeat not the subject of discussion or consultation with SHAPE and (b) that the MC 70 country study on Canada was an analysis representing courses of action which, if taken, would reduce the so-called "gap" but did not repeat not constitute proposals or recommendations to the Canadian government.

3. Text of letter Begins: The comments of the Canadian government on the 1960 MC 70 country study for Canada, which were forwarded to this Headquarters by your letter March 24,† have been considered by my staff. Since most of the points raised have been discussed at one time or another by representatives of the Canadian authorities and this Headquarters, I feel that it is not repeat not necessary to repeat the general comments which have already been made by SHAPE and which are well known to you. I assure you, however, that the comments of your government will be considered further in connection with future force studies undertaken by this Headquarters.

There is one specific point to which I would like to make reference, that is, the future of the four AWX squadrons. I note in paragraph 4F the statement that the Canadian government did not repeat not contemplate re-equipping or replacing the four CF100 all-weather squadrons. In order to avoid any future misunderstanding, I wish to note that a statement to this effect was made by your Minister of National Defense on his visit to SHAPE on February 13, but that this action was not repeat not the subject of discussion or consultation with SHAPE.

In order to record and clarify the purpose of the country study, I would like to quote the memo which served as the basis for my opening remarks at our meeting on February 13 and which has been given either orally or in writing to all of the other countries as well: "Although the scope and purpose of the country study has been broadened considerably in the course of the last year, it may be useful to recall that it was developed originally to assist SACEUR in his analysis of the force posture of Allied Command Europe. It is based on the qualitative standards established by the North Atlantic Council in MC 55/1 and on the force levels laid down in MC 70 which have been approved by the North Atlantic Council for planning purposes. The study measures our achievement to date and indicates the extent of our deficiency in terms of manpower and material, as weighed against the established standards and levels. From the date made available by national authorities and the International Staff, these requirements and deficiencies are translated into terms of money. On the basis of the requirements and the general assessment of the country's economic and financial capabilities provided by the International Staff, SHAPE considers possible means of reducing the deficiencies. This involves possible deferments of certain goals or standards, external assistance through aid programs and assumptions with respect to possible increases in national defence expenditures. The results of this analysis represent courses of action which, if taken, would reduce the gap; but they do not repeat not constitute proposals or recommendations.

SHAPE normally has presented each study to the authorities of the nation concerned as a matter of interest to that country and because the advice and assistance of the national authorities have been of immeasurable help in making an effective analysis." I would like to thank the Canadian authorities for the careful thought that they have given to the country study and to assure you that the comments which you have made available will be given most serious and thorough consideration by this headquarters. Be assured that I shall welcome any additional discussion of this study, in general or in specific terms, at any level, with your authorities.

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW 1960 — CANADIAN EXAMINATION — MUTUAL AID

The inclusion of mutual aid as one of the main topics for discussion during Canada's examination, and the suggestion contained in the Canadian chapter that Canada should provide assistance "on a larger scale" to her NATO partners in need of external aid, are indicative of a desire on the part of the International Staff to stress the inadequacy and possibly to invite criticism of our present mutual aid programme. While we have already stated our position in general terms in our opening statement, it may be useful to provide you with more detailed guidance to assist you in resisting any proposal that our mutual aid programme be reactivated.

2. As you know, Cabinet's decision last year to discontinue the programming, on an annual basis, of military equipment for transfer as mutual aid[62] did not in fact constitute a change in attitude but was actually made necessary by the depletion of Canadian forces surplus stocks and the impracticability of re-introducing direct production items. While Canada is still prepared to make available such equipment as may become surplus to Canadian requirements, the volume of future transfers will necessarily be limited. In recent years the recipient countries themselves have declined several Canadian offers of aid, on the ground that the equipment in question was either obsolete or did not answer their needs.

3. The International Staff's proposal, therefore, that our mutual aid programme be stepped up could not be implemented unless it were possible to re-introduce direct production items on a large scale. As we have already stated, the conditions which prevailed in the earlier years when it was economical to produce items of equipment both for our armed forces and for transfer as mutual aid no longer apply. Indeed, several of the lines of production we have developed are not fitted to European needs, while modern equipment we require has an increasingly large foreign content. It is not realistic to suggest that in the present economic situation in Europe Canadian defence production facilities should be expanded at direct cost to the taxpayer in order to give more substance to our mutual aid programme, or that Canada should provide equipment which she herself has to purchase abroad. This is not to mean, of course, that it might not be advantageous in certain specific cases to extend a production line at relatively small cost, to help meet the needs of some of the European member countries. Each case, however, would have to be considered on its own merits and this is why the provision of direct production items cannot be envisaged otherwise than on an ad hoc basis.

4. Even in its present form, however, our mutual aid programme is not negligible. In this connection, the statement in paragraph 33 of the Canadian chapter, that apart from a limited NATO aircrew training programme, the Canadian mutual aid programme is tailing off, is not quite correct. As you know, aircraft spares support will continue to be provided, on an annual basis, to Greece, Turkey and Portugal. Furthermore (as you will have noted from the mutual aid figures enclosed with our letter of October 25 to Mr. McCardle)† the 1960-61 programme makes provision for some substantial items of equipment. It is therefore premature for the staff to draw the conclusion in paragraph 33 of the Canadian chapter that mutual aid on an ad hoc basis has not yet been developed.

5. In the statement he made in the Annual Review Committee on October 14 (your telegram 2678 of October 19† refers) the U.S. Permanent Representative served notice to European members that in future their governments would have to carry a larger share of the burden in providing for their own needs of conventional equipment. We strongly support this view and consider that we should not hesitate to make this point should we be under pressure at Canada's examination to provide more mutual aid. As indicated in the opening statement, we even consider that the more prosperous European members should be prepared to assist the less developed countries, such as Greece, Turkey and Portugal, which it is recognized are still in need of external aid. We think that the time has come to impress on European countries that Canada should not be looked upon forever as a donor country. Otherwise, the temptation might be great for recipient countries (now that the U.S. is providing less and less conventional equipment) to turn to Canada as an alternative source of supply.

1960 NATO ANNUAL REVIEW — EXAMINATION OF CANADA

Our examination took place on November 4. It went well. On the military questions (final list of military recommendations in SGM-551-60) the NATO military authorities expressed satisfaction with our replies and generally commended Canada on the high standard of Canadian forces. As was to be anticipated, Gregh got somewhat emotional about the level of defence expenditures in relation to GNP and about the decline in mutual aid, but thanks to your guidance and the valuable presence of Hockin, we were able to prevent him from leaving with the committee any lasting misrepresentations or from causing us serious embarrassment. Apart from comments by the Standing Group representative, SHAPE and SACLANT on our replies to the military questions, the examination consisted of a dialogue between the chairman and the Canadian delegate. No repeat no other delegate intervened. The sequence in the agenda as/19-A/262 was followed, although points I(b) and (c) — level of financial resources and mutual aid — were in the main dealt with together. It was in regard to them that Hockin was able to provide very useful assistance.

2. After Gregh had expressed regrets at the absence of Mr. Léger, we made the opening statement contained in your reference telegram. Gregh pointed out that it covered a wide area and dealt in part with some of the more detailed questions on the agenda. He said that he would come back to certain aspects at a later stage. He asked that the military question in SGM-551-60 should be taken in order. We first secured the factual corrections to paragraphs 26 and 28 of the draft country chapter which you requested in your telegram DL-1163 October 28.† The other points in that telegram we brought up in subsequent discussion.

3. Our reply on RCAF survival was in accordance with the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff letter CC-2410.3.14 (JSP/N) October 25 to External† except that we said that "some difficulty" had been experienced in the past regarding the fourth redeployment field rather than "considerable difficulty." The Standing Group representative stated that increasing importance was being placed on survivability in view of the danger of surprise attack and it had been noted that the average peacetime deployment of squadrons in 1 Canadian Air Division was three squadrons per airfield. The SHAPE representative followed this by saying that the twelve Canadian squadrons were deployed on four main bases, 2 IDF and 1 AWX squadron to each field, although use was made of three redeployment fields during exercises. SHAPE was very concerned with survivability, but the problem could only be solved by the concerted effort of nations and SHAPE hoped that the nations themselves would make proposals.

4. With regard to the replacement of escort vessels, our reply followed precisely the guidance given by the CCOS. Both the Standing Group and SACLANT representatives said that they realized that this matter created problems for Canada, but it was their duty to draw attention to it in all cases, so that nations could take timely action. The SACLANT representative next put the question on the carrier-borne Banshee fighters and we replied as the CCOS suggested.

5. Gregh then intervened to say that our replies to the above military questions had been very brief and straightforward, but he was not repeat not quite sure how to interpret them. Canada had said repeatedly that it liked to study physical possibilities and was only prepared (as we had stated in our opening remarks) to give financial forecasts for one year ahead. He wondered whether the studies under way would lead to positive results or whether we would say next year that we would not repeat not be able to overcome the obsolescence problems raised by NATO military authorities. While refusing to predict what the outcome of the studies would be and while refusing to indicate what specific action might be taken, we reassured Gregh that their whole object was to find proper solutions. Canada intended that RCAF squadrons should survive; Canada would not repeat not be satisfied with obsolescent naval equipment.

6. The SHAPE representative thanked us for the reply on the Honest John and said that SHAPE wanted to see the battery arrive with Canadian Brigade Group just as soon as possible.

7. Our reply on aircrew/aircraft ratio was in accordance with your telegram DL-1159 October 28.† The SHAPE representative said that for the first seven months of 1960 the ratio in Canadian IDF squadrons in 1 Air Division had been 1.261 and in AWX squadrons 1.21. As RCAF was composed entirely of regular personnel, SHAPE believed that Canada could achieve comparatively easily the ratio of 1.5 and hoped that this would be done when the conversion to the strike/recce role took place.

8. As one supplementary question, the SACLANT representative said that he had noted that Canadian reply to ARQ(60), in contrast to the reply to ARQ(59), made no repeat no mention of the Maritime Command and Communications Centre. He enquired if further info could be given. We stated that plans were progressing. Funds were provided in 1960/61 for the purchase of property and it was hoped that early approval would be obtained to proceed.

9. The Standing Group representative then said that he wanted to ask for one small amendment to paragraph 6 of the summary appraisal in AR(60) CDA-D/4. He asked that the words in the third sentence which read "Canada, which is fulfilling the NATO military requirements" should be amended to read "Canada, which is nearly meeting the NATO military requirements." He apologized for not repeat not having given advance warning and stressed that there was no repeat no ulterior motive such as the sudden discovery of some major deficiency. However, if the original sentence stood, there would not repeat not really be any grounds for the recommendations in SGM-551-60. Canadian defence effort was very much appreciated by NATO military authorities. You could rate it at 99 percent, but it was not repeat not quite 100 percent. He therefore argued that the revised wording would be factually more consistent. We replied that we could not repeat not accept the change immediately, but would report it in the favourable context that General Barry had presented. Gregh reminded us that the summary appraisal was the sole responsibility of the International Staff and of the NATO military authorities and that Canadian concurrence was not repeat not essential. If we did not repeat not agree, we had the right to circulate a note to all concerned giving the reasons for our disagreement, but this procedure had never yet been adopted. I think we need not repeat not take issue with this rather academic revision.

10. On points I(b) and (c) of the agenda we said that we did not repeat not want to make any general statement, but would be glad to hear Gregh's views. All we would say on point (b) was that we believed the prospects to be good. Gregh then galloped away on his hobby horses. He said that he appreciated the realistic Canadian approach only to accept engagements which could be fulfilled. However, as our opening statement had indicated, Canadian contribution was divided into two main parts, that for Canada-USA region and that for SHAPE and SACLANT. The International Staff did not repeat not know many of the details of the former, but it was likely to take up an increasing proportion of funds in the future. There had, nevertheless, hitherto been a third part, namely Canadian mutual aid. It was more than symbolic. It had been of great assistance to European countries in the build-up of their forces. He was glad to hear that aircrew training agreements with Denmark and Norway had been renewed but, on the materiel side, Canadian aid had been declining considerably over the last few years. A number of European countries were still very dependent on military aid to achieve their MC 70 requirements and it was the duty of the International Staff to help the NATO military authorities in this respect by bringing pressure to bear on those countries which could provide assistance. Furthermore, the actual Canadian aid achievements in recent years had been considerably less than the forecasts. Last year Canada maintained that conditions had changed and that there would no repeat no longer be an annual Canadian mutual aid programme. We had announced rather that we would try to develop aid transfers on an ad hoc basis. However, our opening statement seemed to frustrate these hopes. We had suggested that many European countries could themselves provide aid to their less prosperous partners. This went too far. Some might be able to do so, but it was dangerous to suggest that they should give aid in addition to meeting their own goals. Canadian financial situation appeared to be such that Canada could afford to continue the provision of aid. Mutual aid was part of the treaty itself and Canada seemed to imply now that Europe should take care of its own needs on one side with USA and Canada taking care of theirs on the other. He did not repeat not welcome any such division into separate geographical compartments.

11. More generally on the economic situation in Canada, Gregh said that the current picture, as he saw it, was somewhat confused. There were both favourable and unfavourable tendencies. Although the growth of GNP in 1960 might be only 1-2 percent, this was likely to be far below the average in the longer term and he believed that any unfavourable tendencies were purely transitory. Public opinion in almost every country of the Alliance considered the defence effort to be excessive, but it was a fact that between 1953-59, speaking in terms of constant value, GNP in Canada had increased 18 1/2 percent, whereas on the same basis for the same period the defence effort had declined 33 percent. There was no repeat no valid reason to justify the latter decrease. The threat was as great, there was no repeat no reduction in the cost of equipment and personnel and operating costs were rising. He found it hard to see how Canada could fulfil major re-equipment programmes if funds available for defence went down, even though Canada had said that commitments were conceived in physical terms with the necessary funds being found to meet them. In the Alliance as a whole the percentage of GNP which Canada devoted to defence was about average. Several European countries, like France and UK, had a higher proportion and it had to be remembered that most of those which had a percentage lower than Canada also had a far lower standard of living.

12. We said that the Chairman had implied that Canadian mutual aid had almost dried up completely. This just was not repeat not the case. It was hoped that a figure of $54.8 million could be reached in 1960/61 of which $35 million was for equipment. This compared very favourably with the actual figure of $18.1 million for equipment in 1959/60. We considered that the reference in paragraph 33 of the draft country chapter to a "tailing off" was an exaggeration. The amount forecast for the current year was still quite a tail. It was also entirely wrong to imply that there had been some change in political will on the part of Canadian government to co-operate with NATO partners. No repeat no such thing had occurred. We were always anxious to co-operate when we believed that such co-operation made sense from our own viewpoint and from that of our allies. Last year Gregh had commended us for our co-operation with Germans in the F104G programme and had quoted it as an example of something which should become more widespread. These arrangements have been strengthened over the past months and this co-operation was now extended to all European countries participating in the F104G production. Canada was prepared to do what was useful and necessary. We had said so in 1959 and would repeat it again, but conditions had changed and Canadian government was merely adapting itself to the new circumstances as it saw them. Lastly, the Chairman had attempted to suggest that Canada had no repeat no long-term plans. This too was quite erroneous. We certainly did develop long-term plans for equipment. All we had said in our opening statement was that we could only forecast defence expenditures for one year ahead. The International Staff had themselves said in paragraph 38 of the draft country chapter "Canada had not repeat not allowed financial considerations to impede to any significant extent the fulfilment of NATO military requirements." It was therefore inconsistent to imply now that there were formal budgetary limitations. If that were the Chairman's opinion, we defied him to confirm it from any official document.

13. Gregh thanked us for our remarks which he said went a good way towards dissipating his fears. He had been rather alarmed at our references to what European countries should do for themselves. He recognized that conditions had changed, but he still felt that he should point out that the impact of current Canadian aid on Canadian defence budget was almost negligible. Also, the figure of $54.8 million could not repeat not really be considered as a total forecast, since it contained $14.5 million for Canadian contributions to infrastructure and NATO budgets. These contributions did not repeat not fall within the commonly accepted aid definition.

14. Hockin then gave a summary of the current Canadian economic situation. He pointed out that Canada had entered a recessionary period over the last few months. The high level of unemployment was a cause for concern. There had been a diminution in industrial production and there was a regrettable surplus of capacity. The balance of payments position had improved somewhat and the current account deficit was less, but this related to the merchandising sector. There was a growing deficit on the non-merchandising account. This was significant for Canada since it reflected the increasing level of servicing which had to be done on external debt. In 1959 the current account deficit was attributable to the extent of two-thirds to the non-merchandising account. Within the latter roughly one-half of the deficit was due to interest and dividend payments to foreign investors. In 1959 the current account deficit amounted to $1.4 billion. This would be the equivalent of, say, $20 billion for USA. In 1960 the situation was improving, but it was likely that the deficit would run around $1 billion. In USA terms, this would be roughly $15 billion. This deficit was matched by an inflow of capital, mostly long-term, which had an impact on Canadian political scene since it involved an increase in foreign ownership. The size of the current account deficit was emphasized because it had a bearing on the question of military and non-military aid. Non-military aid had gone up a great deal. One might almost say that Canada was borrowing abroad to give equipment away. We were not repeat not suggesting that this should not repeat not happen, but the background needed to be known. The press and certain leading figures in Canadian life were beginning to pay close attention to the problem of Canada's balance of payments and more would be heard in the future.

15. With regard to the situation in financial markets, the comments in the draft country chapter were somewhat out of date. In 1959 capital markets had recovered from earlier difficulties. There was a return of confidence in the stability of prices. Holdings of public debt were increased. This continued until about May 1960, but since then there had been a decline in such holdings amounting to some $300 million. At the same time there was a substantial though temporary retirement of debt by the Federal Government. There were therefore no repeat no immediate effects on interest rates but the latter did rise in October when demands on the capital market increased. This rise occurred in spite of a considerable increase in the money supply and ease in the banking system. The foregoing could possibly be attributed in part to developments in the economy such as the failure of personal disposable income to expand and a sharp fall in corporation profits and in part to influence of USA financial markets. There were also expectations in Canadian financial circles that requirements of capital by the government would be greater than forecast earlier.

16. The Chairman had referred to the great wealth of Canada and to the country's tremendous resources which he believed gave an assurance of future prosperity. This was understandable but Canadians themselves were now taking a more sober view. Canada was facing the difficulties which confront all primary producers. There was a weakness in international commodity markets and it was hard to sell. Resources were only of value if somebody wanted them. Growth in demand did not repeat not always match growth in supply. Production had outstripped demand and, to quote one example, Canada had grave doubts about ability to market agricultural products in certain traditional areas. This depended on decisions made elsewhere and cast a shadow on export prospects.

17. To sum up, Mr. Hockin stressed that the economic outlook was not repeat not nearly as clear as it appeared in 1959. However, Canada was not repeat not saying it could not repeat not afford to do certain things, but Canadian authorities could see no repeat no valid object in sending to their NATO partners production items which in many cases could be produced more cheaply and equally plentifully in Europe. There was little support in Canada at the present time for large-scale military assistance to Europe. As we had said earlier, Canada was prepared to co-operate when it was convinced that such co-operation made sense.

18. Gregh said that Mr. Hockin's overall analysis furnished valuable background, but he wanted to get replies to certain specific points. Canadian delegation had so far made no repeat no attempt to explain why the defence effort had decreased 33 percent in a period in which GNP had bone up by 18 1/2 percent. Furthermore, if you compared the federal budget as a whole between 1952-53 and 1959-60 you noted that it had increased by 32 percent, requirements on civil account had risen 71 percent and those for defence had declined 20 percent. Canadian delegation had implied that Canadian public were no repeat no longer interested in furnishing aid to NATO. However, aid to underdeveloped countries under the Colombo Plan had been stepped up. He had seen it said in Canadian press that this was a great help to Canadian industry, being in the nature of a grant export. If that were so, could not repeat not Canadian industry also be helped by grant exports to NATO? He found it hard to understand the discrepancy.

19. Mr. Hockin answered that it was quite true that there had been an increase in GNP and an increase in the national budget generally. It was further correct to say that the latter was primarily for civil expenditures. He pointed out that at the end of the 1939-45 war Canada had a very low level of social security and very little social infrastructure in terms of European practice. This had not repeat not been a feature of earlier Canadian tradition, but Canadian public now demanded it. Even now the levels prevalent in Europe had not repeat not been reached in Canada. Secondly, immigration into Canada since 1945 had been very high and this required heavy expenditures for social infrastructure in the way of housing, schools, roads etc., while such expenses fell at the municipal and provincial levels, local revenues were insufficient to meet the need and the Federal Government had had to augment transfer payments.

20. In respect of the level of defence expenditures it had to be remembered that Canada had virtually abolished its armed forces after 1945. Therefore, when Canada joined NATO in 1949, there was a new start almost from scratch. The build-up was tremendous and this was accentuated by Korean conflict. Very heavy expenditures on equipment and infrastructure in the early years caused a bulge. These elements have gradually tapered off, whereas there was a rising level of personnel expenditures. Canada recognized that a number of major items of equipment acquired during the original build-up would have to be replaced, but we could not repeat not say what this would amount to in terms of levels of expenditures. We could only repeat our earlier assurance that we would find adequate financial support to meet our physical commitments. Canadian parliament was extremely sensitive about discussion of levels of expenditures which it had not repeat not approved.

21. With regard to aid for NATO, we had said before that there was no repeat no lack of support in Canada for the Alliance and for Canadian forces contribution, but any project had to make sense to Canadian authorities and take account of the economic situation both in Canada and abroad. There was a boom in Europe. Canada welcomed it. This was the hoped-for result of the Marshall Plan to which Canada had given material support. Today, Canadian public believed that aid to underdeveloped countries did make sense. There was a shift in balance between aid to those countries and aid to Europe. The only change was in deliveries of military equipment to Europe and the Chairman had made his comparisons in far too broad a context. The beginning of Canada's own re-equipment programmes was already having an impact. We were having to buy abroad more expensive and complex weapons systems. While the effect of such procurement was relatively insignificant on the balance of payments in 1959, this was no repeat no longer true in 1960. There was an increase of more than 50 percent in prime and subsidiary contracts placed abroad. There was admittedly some slack in the so-called Canadian defence producing industries, but we were compelled to buy abroad and the very things which we had to purchase externally were those likely to be needed by European countries. We could not repeat not use our own facilities alone.

22. In spite of his earlier criticisms Gregh summed up by saying that Canada had redemonstrated a will to co-operate. Canadian forces were effective and had excellent equipment. Canadian government would adapt its policy year by year to what was necessary in terms of physical requirements. Canada had always met her commitments in the past and there was no repeat no reason to believe that this would not repeat not continue in the future. The economic situation at the moment might be difficult, but we lived in a world of interdependence and a recession could arise in Europe. He took note that public opinion in Canada was only prepared to provide aid "which makes sense" and that it thought at present that aid to underdeveloped countries made more sense than military aid to NATO. However, it was his hope that Canadian public could be educated to realize there was a close inter-relation in all forms of aid and that military aid to NATO was within the spirit of interdependence.

23. USA representative merely commented that he had listened with particular attention to the interchange on the economic situation and on aid for reasons of which members of the committee would be well aware. He was of course referring to earlier USA statements about USA balance of payments deficits, the outflow of gold and the impact which this situation would have on USA aid programmes.

24. We thanked the Chairman for letting us set Canadian situation in perspective. We said that our defence effort was all for NATO, whether in Canada-USA region or in Europe. We took pride in the high state of readiness of our forces and we expected that this would continue. We undertook to convey to you the gist of the examination, saying that particular attention would be drawn to those points which the Chairman himself had stressed.

25. Before concluding, Gregh made a strong plea that a visiting team should be allowed to go to Ottawa in the spring of 1961. He believed that this would be of real help to get a full understanding of Canadian picture and it would be particularly important during the first year of the triennial review. We said we would pass on the request sympathetically. We consider that refusal would put us in a difficult position with the staff next year and would be hard to justify. We therefore hope that you will give your agreement in principle before the end of the current review, although the details and timing of the visit will of course have to be worked out later.

26. We are repeating this telegram for info to all our NATO posts in the hope that it may be of value to them in any discussions concerning Canadian contribution to the NATO defence effort.

RÉUNION MINISTÉRIELLE, PARIS 16-18 DÉCEMBRE 1960 MINISTERIAL MEETING, PARIS, 16-18 DECEMBER, 1960

208. DEA/50105-G-40

Note du chef de la Direction européenne pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, European Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], August 12, 1960

MEETING OF EXPERTS IN PARIS ON SOVIET POLICY

The meeting of Experts on Soviet Policy has been proposed for October 19-21 and on Eastern Europe for October 24-26. The British representative on the Political Advisers Committee has made a suggestion that, in addition to the drafting session on Soviet policy, the experts might meet first in Paris some three or four weeks before for a general discussion. They would then return to their capitals, prepare drafts which would be submitted to the Secretariat for coordination insofar as this was possible, and the experts would meet again to draw up the paper. I attach copies of the relevant telegrams.

2. It seems to us that this British proposal is a most sensible one. The first session would provide an opportunity for an effective discussion on Soviet policy. It would also be an appropriate occasion, we think for urging that the final paper should take account of differing interpretations of Soviet policy, along lines set out in a personal letter to Mr. Léger which you signed after the last meeting of experts.[63]

3. I think you will agree that we have been most effectively represented at the last two meetings of experts by Mr. Robert Ford. The one disadvantage of this practice has, however, been the fact that we have been limited for information on the discussions in Paris to written reports prepared by Mr. Ford which, while excellent, have been necessarily incomplete. On this occasion we should like to suggest an arrangement which would take account of the fact that Mr. Ford is probably our most effective representative for the meeting of experts and yet which would ensure that we have in Ottawa a greater source of information on the discussion at the meeting and privately among the experts. I recommend that an offer from Ottawa should be sent to Paris to represent us at the preliminary meeting of experts. He would then return to Ottawa, where a Canadian draft submission could be prepared. This draft would be sent to Mr. Ford for comment and for advance information. At the second and more important drafting meeting we would be represented by Mr. Ford, assisted, if this seems desirable at the time, by an officer from Ottawa.

4. I should be grateful if you could indicate whether you agree with this suggestion.[64]

5. I might mention that the Departmental working group on the Sino-Soviet bloc intends to review its previous paper on Soviet foreign policy in the light of post-U-2 developments. This review should serve as a basis for the position taken by our representative at the experts meeting in Paris and for our subsequent submission to the experts group. It would also be of assistance to our delegation to the United Nations General Assembly.

MEETING OF EXPERTS ON SOVIET POLICY

Following from Ford.

The three days of meeting were completed and the experts now disperse until November 21. I believe that all delegates leave highly satisfied with the outcome of the discussions and satisfied that the new procedure is effective.

2. Discussion was guided by an eleven point agenda covering the domestic situation, relations with Soviet bloc and the main foreign policy questions. We had prepared as a precaution a draft agenda using virtually the same subject headings as had been set out in a Secretariat agenda but revising the other considerably. French had prepared an extremely comprehensive agenda covering the whole subject in detail. When it became apparent that the shorter agenda was preferred and the order in the Secretariat draft not repeat not satisfactory, we presented our compromise agenda which was accepted.

3. Discussion was carried on without any text before the committee other than the agenda. From the first it developed into a discussion between Bohlen and Laloy at a brilliant level. The level was so high indeed that most delegates hesitated to intervene since all the essential points seemed to emerge from the Bohlen-Laloy dialogue. I was in a position to add some points to the discussion and to bring out differences between Bohlen's and Laloy's analyses; one intervention on the last morning provoked a debate which was carried on throughout most of the day. Although I spoke relatively little, it may have seemed that my contribution was large in comparison to other delegates (obviously apart from USA and French), I think this is to be explained by the fact that the other senior delegates, while holding high offices in their foreign ministries, may not repeat not have had a detailed knowledge of the subject under discussion.

4. From the discussions it seemed that the group agreed without great difficulty in their analyses of Soviet domestic policy, problems in relations with Soviet bloc, and on specific foreign policy issues. A major though still imprecise disagreement emerged between Bohlen's and Laloy's overall interpretation of the reasons for changes in Soviet policy. It is difficult to be precise because Laloy changed ground in the course of the debate. Laloy appeared to consider that changes in Soviet policy are motivated in large measures by a desire alternatively to woo and frighten the West. Bohlen argued persuasively that the controlling factor in Soviet foreign policy was the contradiction between the interests of Soviet state power and Soviet position as head of the world communist movement. Laloy considered that the more aggressive Soviet policy adopted in May was undertaken to frighten the West. Bohlen, who thought that the significant change dated from the end of June, believed that Soviet retreat from a policy of détente was necessitated by Soviet government's need to reassert control of the world communist movement. He maintained that this concern accounted for the otherwise inexplicable Soviet behaviour in UN. Another manifestation of the differing analyses was that Laloy tended to hold the view that Soviet government could create a crisis or not repeat not at will in Berlin, whereas Bohlen saw Soviet action in Berlin as evidence of Ulbricht as leader of East Germany forcing Soviet Union as head of the world communist movement, to make demands on West in Berlin even though these may provoke a dangerous crisis that would not repeat not be in the national interest of USSR.

5. A drafting group was set up on the evening of the second day comprising representatives from French, German and UK delegates to prepare an analysis of Soviet policy, bearing in mind the discussion within the committee. Their draft was discussed on the last evening. Certain sections of this draft were criticized quite fundamentally. As we had prepared in our own papers a summary of the major areas of agreement during the committee discussion, we submitted our summary as a committee document. Some embarrassment was created by the fact that a couple of delegates suggested that our paper might better serve as a résumé of the group's discussion than the paper of the drafting group. Although this suggestion was fortunately not repeat not adopted, since it would have caused difficulty for us, several of the points made in our summary were incorporated into the drafting group's paper and we had the impression that our submission had been helpful.

6. The committee reached general agreement on the paper summarizing the more significant conclusions which emerged from the discussion. French delegate will now rework these conclusions into a more presentable paper which will be submitted to member governments. This later draft will serve as the working paper for the drafting meeting in November. It should not repeat not be too difficult to reach agreement at the second meeting except for the major difference of view noted above. So that this difference will be carefully formulated USA and French delegates will each submit a statement of their own case. Although the drafting session may try to reconcile these two views, it is accepted that both will be stated in the final paper for presentation to the ministers if reconciliation should not repeat not be possible.

7. The resultant paper for ministers should be shorter, less factual, more provocative and a better guide to an understanding of Soviet foreign policy. Its main feature should be to provide an analysis of Soviet action rather than a description of recent events.

8. Bohlen brought out one important point in arguing against a suggestion of Laloy that the point at issue between them was too complex for inclusion in a ministerial paper. Bohlen criticized what he considered to be the general failure in West to provide an objective and honest assessment of the nature of the Soviet challenge for consideration at the political level. He implied that previous NATO analyses had failed in this respect.

9. A number of the delegates spoke of the extraordinarily valuable educational effect of the meetings. They were referring of course to the brilliant dialogue between Bohlen and Laloy. Four of the delegates, apart from Bohlen, were of the level of assistant under-secretary or higher and it was undoubtedly extremely useful for them to attend the meetings.

10. I think we can be satisfied with the role which we played in the committee. Our interventions were, I hope, sufficiently appropriate and I trust not repeat not too frequent. Our two submissions appeared to facilitate the work of the committee and appreciation was expressed for our efforts. Should a similar meeting be held in future I think we should continue to be represented by two delegates.

NATO LONG-TERM PLANNING — INTERVIEW WITH GENERAL NORSTAD

I had an hour's talk this morning November 7 with General Norstad concerning what new proposals in the military field might be put before ministers for the December meeting. Kitching and McCardle were with me.

2. In response to a single question, Norstad launched into a long exposition of his own thinking and of what might be expected in the way of USA proposals which was the clearest and most comprehensive account I have been ever been given. Norstad has obviously been deeply engaged in this subject over the past few months and he told us that he might be going to Washington again next week to talk about it.

3. He said he would like to break the subject into three parts in an attempt to avoid the confusion which had entered into some accounts of his own ideas and of the Bowie Report[65] which have appeared in the newspapers. He regarded his own recommendations to the President of USA as the fundamental recommendation into which more specific plans of great importance in themselves could be fitted. His own recommendations had sprung from repeated questions to him by European leaders over the past few years as to why they should commit their troops to a nuclear strategy when there was no repeat no guarantee (a) that the nuclear weapons themselves would remain in Europe and (b) when they had no repeat no control whatsoever over the use of these weapons. He had not repeat not been able to give any satisfactory answer to these questions. He had therefore over the past year in official correspondence and in interviews with the President urged that he be put in a position to answer both these questions. He had recommended that USA should, to meet the first question, offer a guarantee to its European allies that a certain number of nuclear weapons (and the numbers would be a matter of detailed decision) essential to the defence of the European area of NATO would remain in place for the life of the North Atlantic Treaty and would only be removed as the result of a decision taken by NATO itself. So far as the second question was concerned, he had recommended that some means be found to give NATO control over the use of these necessary nuclear weapons.

4. The second distinguishable element of the problem, according to Norstad, was his military need for MRBMs, a requirement which he had stated more than a year ago and which had led to the Gates proposals.[66] Norstad emphasized that his requirement was a simple requirement for modernization of equipment in order to permit him to carry out the responsibilities which he had been given to defend NATO area. Provision of these weapons would not repeat not give him or NATO any new task or responsibility.

5. The third element was the idea that NATO should be given control of its own strategic deterrent. This was not repeat not a Norstad idea but one which had emerged from the Bowie report. He, Norstad, did not repeat not agree with Bowie that such an idea should be pushed at this time. At some stage it might indeed be desirable to give NATO control of an element of the strategic deterrent but in Norstad's opinion this could come later.

6. These then were the three strands which had become interwoven, especially in newspaper accounts of what USA proposals might be made in the near future. Norstad said quite frankly he did not repeat not know what USA proposals would be made. He had urged however that whatever they were they be made by about November 20 in order that ministers would have an opportunity to study them carefully before the December meeting. He knew that "great pressure" was being brought on Washington by Adenauer that this timetable be adhered to and that other European allies were exerting pressure to a lesser degree in Washington towards the same end.

7. He spoke at length about the first and what he obviously regarded as the most fundamental recommendation. In his view, it was the only course of action which would prevent the growth of a German problem, i.e., a national German programme for the production of nuclear weapons. The recommendation would probably involve USA Atomic Energy Act but he had urged on USA authorities that this problem should be faced. While the lawyers were of two minds on the subject, there were those who believed that no repeat no change in USA legislation would be required but that simple congressional approval of a course of action proposed by the executive would be sufficient. Norstad believed it would be essential to get this issue cleared as quickly as possible in order that there would be no repeat no doubt that a USA proposal along these lines carried congressional support. He was confident in his own mind that such congressional support could be obtained. A USA proposal along these lines would, he believed, "have some influence" on the French programme for the building of a national nuclear capability. He referred to a report which he had just received of a very recent conversation between Spaak and Messmer, the Minister of French Armed Forces, wherein Spaak had asked what French reaction would be to an American proposal along these lines. Messmer's answer had been "it would be difficult to reject." Norstad's own view was that any American movement which made it possible to answer the questions outlined above would put some "crimp" in French programme and, more important, would offer them a way out of assuming what would be an almost impossible financial burden.

8. Norstad said that he was fully aware that his recommendation did not repeat not solve the problem of control. On the other hand, it created nothing new in the problem which already existed. He hoped therefore that people would concentrate less on the problem of control which was inherent in the recommendation and more on the fact that it would give some additional authority to the other members of the Alliance, authority which would of course be taken away from him, SACEUR. He felt that if an American proposal were made along the lines of his recommendation and if it were accepted, additional stimulus would be given to the Council to make some progress on the details of control machinery. If people were to dwell, however, on the control machinery per se, no repeat no progress would be made and NATO would be the weaker for lack of progress and for lack of the required weapons.

9. In further elaboration of his recommendations, he said that he had taken a strong line with Mr. Eisenhower that he, the President, should do nothing which would assist French in the creation of a national nuclear force. He had made these recommendations as an American for he believed from his experience in Europe that if USA were to lend assistance to a French national effort, other European members would lose all respect for USA sense of responsibility. In Norstad's view, if this respect were lost, so would be the cause of USA leadership. It was essential therefore in his view that USA should offer some alternative to attempt to give General de Gaulle some reason for either not repeat not continuing his programme or at least for not repeat not pressing on with it with great vigour. He went on to say that he had urged President Eisenhower to act on these recommendations as quickly as possible so that they would have the stamp of his approval which would mean a great deal in Europe. He saw no reason why the elections should affect an American proposal along this line. It would constitute a most respectable legacy to leave to President Eisenhower's successor, whoever he might be. He could agree however that there were reasons why such a proposal should not repeat not be made while the election campaign was in progress. He obviously had the impression that his recommendations had been well received by the President and by a number of senior USA officials. He could not repeat not however be assured that they would be acted on.

10. Turning then to the second element of the question, i.e., his need for MRBMs, he argued that the land-based Polaris offer made by Gates could not repeat not now be implemented in the time required. He could live with this situation as a military commander if five USA Polaris-carrying submarines with their eighty missiles could be deployed to serve NATO defence interests. These, put together with approximately 45 Jupiter missiles (in Turkey and Greece) and the Thor missiles in UK, would cover NATO's military requirement for the 1962-64 period. He understood that by 1964 there would be a much more mobile weapon of the Polaris type which would be about half the weight of the present Polaris and much more effective. He hoped that that weapon could be brought into operation in approximately 1964 and deployed on mobile bases (he mentioned ordinary highway vans) through NATO Europe.

In this context he said he had told Mr. Watkinson recently that UK could make a virtue of necessity and give over their Thor weapons to NATO uses. Certainly these weapons were a millstone around UK government's neck at the moment and they should be glad to get rid of national responsibility for them. Such a move could be made politically most attractive and could help Germans and French in their problems.

11. Finally, so far as a strategic deterrent force under NATO control was concerned, Norstad thought it was for the future and should not repeat not be pressed at this time.

12. One could not repeat not help but be impressed with General Norstad's sincerity in trying to find some means by which he could bring into harness the military requirements which he saw as a military commander and the political requirements which NATO governments were faced with. It is obviously his strong hope that something like the recommendations set out above will be made by USA government but he could not repeat not assure us that this would be the case. He was fully aware that many problems of control machinery would have to be faced but he obviously believed that these could not repeat not much longer go undiscussed.

NATO REVIEW OF SOVIET INTENTIONS

Following are Ford's preliminary comments on Secretarial draft (NATO AC/119-NR/2):

While body of paper can serve as an adequate basis for discussion, introductory paragraphs seem to me unsatisfactory. If one accepts the desirability of an agreed paper then I think we should make this our aim and, with the authority of Bohlen behind us, it should be possible to modify French view sufficiently to reach a unanimous conclusion.

2. I would suggest that the introduction might be rewritten along following lines:

Since the break-up of the Summit, Soviet policy has become markedly more militant. Khrushchev retreated from the negotiations he had assiduously sought since his resumption of power because prospects for reaching an agreement had receded, unexpected opposition within the Bloc appeared and opportunities arose for improving Soviet defensive position and discrediting USA.

The swing to a harder line is typical of the vigorous and flexible policy pursued by Khrushchev. There seem to be two well-defined limits within this policy must operate, given of course the basic hostility of USSR to all governments, communist or otherwise, not repeat not under their direct control.

In pursuing a tough policy Russians are not repeat not likely to exceed a point at which there would be a risk of nuclear war, the avoidance of which remains a fundamental aim. It is their awareness of this danger which forms the basis of their policy of peaceful coexistence and sets a limit to the degree to which they are prepared to be tough with the outside world.

In the other direction, the "soft" line as advocated by Khrushchev up to the Summit breakdown cannot repeat not be pursued beyond the point at which it would endanger the unity of Soviet world or Russia's predominant place in it.

Peaceful coexistence, and Soviet interpretation of the non-inevitability of war, imply in Soviet view the continuance of the struggle with West by all means short of war. A policy of détente offers many attractive possibilities for the advancement of Soviet influence and power, but it is highly unlikely that Russians are interested in letting it develop into an entente with West.

The motivations behind the variations in Soviet policy are probably in part pragmatic and opportunist, but at the same time they have to operate within the limitations imposed by a developing Soviet society and by conditions in the Bloc, including possible contradictions between the interests of Russia state and those of the world-wide communist movement. The fluctuations of Soviet policy are therefore to be explained in terms not repeat not of contradictions arising out of conflicting objectives but in terms of internal and external circumstances.

While it is impossible to be dogmatic it would seem logical to assume that the present trend towards a "hard" Soviet policy is a temporary phase and will be followed by a further attempt to create conditions necessary for renewed East-West talks. At the same time there is no repeat no sign that Russians are prepared to make concessions on the major issues in dispute. End of suggested text.

3. I should be grateful for comments on this and the main points of the Secretariat's draft.

NATO REVIEW OF SOVIET INTENTIONS

Following for Ford. We agree with your comment that the main body of the paper can serve as an adequate basis for discussion and that the introductory section is the weakest part. We like your revision of the first section and hope the committee will accept it. However, if you consider that you have to make too many concessions to gain unanimity, you may propose that opposing views be set out independently as two possible explanations of an agreed phenomenon, as has been done in Section VII.

2. The following comments, although rather detailed, are not intended as precise instructions. Their purpose is to give you as clear an indication as possible of our thinking in Ottawa. You may use the material as you consider appropriate in the circumstances.

3. It seems to us that the English draft is a translation from the French, which may explain some of the awkward wording. We hope that the final draft in English will be a more readable document.

4. We have two suggested amendments for your revised introductory section, the first to make explicit the significance of the U2 incident and the second to amplify the importance of Khrushchev's modification of the doctrine of peaceful coexistence.

5. The introduction might now begin as follows: "Since the breakdown of the Summit Soviet policy has become markedly more militant. The failure of the U2 flight provided an opportunity for improving the Soviet defensive position and discrediting the United States, and the Soviet government accordingly decided to play up the incident. This decision in turn necessitated a retreat from negotiations that Khrushchev has assiduously sought since his assumption of power. The arguments in favour of this course of action were supported by the fact that prospects for reaching an agreement had receded and because unexpected opposition within the Bloc had developed."

6. After … "remains a fundamental aim" you might add "of Khrushchev's policy, for which he has sought general acceptance since the 20th Party Congress" and add at the end of the paragraph the following sentence "This limitation on the use of Soviet military power to promote communism is one of the principle points of dispute with the Chinese." We think it important to amplify this thought in a paper which also emphasizes the continuing hostility of the Soviet Union towards the West.

7. Paragraph 8 – We think it inappropriate to draw conclusions at the end of the introductory section, and think that Section VIII might be revised to include general conclusions (see below).

8. Paragraph 9 – The last sentence might either be deleted or amended to suggest that Khrushchev appears to be aware of this problem, which probably accounts for his emphasis on the modified doctrine of peaceful coexistence.

9. Paragraph 10 – Some indication of the fact that Khrushchev, unlike Stalin, has to take into account party opinion would, we think, enlarge the significance of this paragraph for ministers.

10. Paragraph 11 – We would like to see the two concluding sentences deleted. The idea in the last sentence is already set out more correctly in the section on disarmament. The first idea is highly controversial. In a departmental study we were unable to find evidence of Soviet exports deliberately intended to destroy Western industries, although increased sales can weaken a sensitive market. But as Soviet exports are intended to cover their import requirements, the more the world price falls the more they have to export to cover their needs. Their increasing exports of oil, for example, are to be explained by the need to cover increased imports under the seven-year plan. Oil is a commodity in surplus in the USSR and Western markets are in many cases vulnerable to price cutting. Of course, the economic objective can have political consequences, as Cuba shows. The increased Soviet import programme might even make the Soviet Union more vulnerable to Western countermeasures than it has been in the recent past.

11. Paragraph 14 – We would like to see this paragraph clarified. We think the word "accommodation" goes too far, although it may be that the French and English words have different connotations. As for Soviet fears of Chinese expansion southward, we consider that the Soviet government is primarily concerned to avoid having to face a choice between abandoning China or having to support Chinese aggression.

12. Paragraph 16 – We should like to see this paragraph redrafted. The fact is that the West derives some advantage from the Sino-Soviet split, since it confuses communist parties in the non-communist world. The point to be made is that there is little which the West can do to promote the dispute. We are surprised by the suggestion that the West could cause Khrushchev to separate himself from the Chinese. But since Soviet policy towards the West is one of the issues in the Sino-Soviet dispute, it seems to follow that alternative Western policies could have some slight influence on the development of the dispute. For example, we think that a firm Western policy would strengthen Khrushchev's case by demonstrating that the West is not a "paper tiger." At the same time Khrushchev has to justify his policy of treating with the West. In negotiations on the suspension of nuclear tests, for example, he must ultimately show, as must the West, some success or abandon the attempt. As will be suggested in our final conclusions, a Western position of firmness is fully consistent with a willingness to negotiate where desirable compromises can be achieved. The advantages were well demonstrated by the Austrian State Treaty.

13. Paragraph 18 – The words after the colon in the second sentence might be deleted and replaced by "and has in large measure been willingly accepted by the receiving countries." The last sentence might be ended with "educational facilities," since the question of satellite activities was dealt with in the Eastern European paper.

14. Paragraphs 19 and 20 – You might also include some reference to the point made by Laloy about the difficulty of deciding whether Western aid should go to ex-colonial countries which are flirting with the communists.

15. Paragraphs 21 and 22 – A number of points made in paragraph 21 strike us as being irrelevant and unhelpful. We should like to see the paragraph begin with the second sentence "to the Soviet mind … has no validity," to be followed with a new sentence "The USSR has never been favourably disposed towards the UN, although it has in the past relied on its veto to prevent it from taking action to which it was opposed." Paragraph 22 could be added at this point, to begin "Moreover the Soviets …".

16. Paragraph 23 – The idea should be brought out that the Soviet attacks are already limiting the Secretary-General's freedom of action.

17. Paragraph 25 – The view might be expressed more explicitly that the USSR may fear that control measures might be used by the West to mount a surprise attack on the Soviet Union. The last sentence might end with the word "disarmament," since we do not consider there is any likelihood or danger that Western governments will accept disadvantageous proposals. The target of Soviet propaganda is more likely the uncommitted world.

18. Paragraph 26 – We consider it possible that Khrushchev may now hope after the election of Kennedy to resume serious negotiations on nuclear test talks. This idea should be reflected in this paragraph.

19. Section VI – It might be worthwhile introducing a conclusion to this section which would suggest the need for the Western side to exert greater efforts to explain to the USSR its reasons for its policy on controls.

20. Paragraph 28 – We consider that the idea in the last sentence could be valid but are doubtful about the thought that Berlin affords opportunities "for trouble-making in a wider field."

21. Paragraph 29 – The observation in brackets in the first sentence is inconsistent with the second sentence and gives the wrong impression. It should be deleted.

22. Paragraph 30 – The difficulty which the Soviet Union faces in putting off a decision on Berlin might be better brought out and the thought in the last sentence certainly needs either clarification or to be deleted. The real difficulty of the Western position in Berlin is to find an effective and safe means of resisting Soviet and East German encroachments.

23. Section VIII – We think this section might be considerably revised, and perhaps entitled "General Conclusions." The ideas in the latter part of paragraphs 36 and 37 are particularly badly expressed. We think that the following positive points might be made:

(a) The Soviet threat will continue and the West must stand militarily firm and politically united. It is the strength of the West which has forced the Soviet leaders to moderate to the degree which they have their hostility towards the West;

(b) The West should not be overly influenced by vacillations in Soviet policy, since many of these changes are adopted in response to requirements within the USSR, the Soviet bloc and the world communist movement. The objective of these changes is therefore not primarily to influence the West. The Western response ought therefore to be steadier;

(c) The West should stand ready to negotiate seriously on any issue in which the Soviet Union indicates a willingness to reach a reasonable compromise. Summit meetings should be preceded by adequate preparations;

(d) A major subject of any Summit meeting is likely to be Berlin and Germany and careful preparation is therefore important. No substantial compromise on West Berlin and Germany being conceivable, complete failure to reach agreement at a meeting devoted exclusively to Berlin and Germany might put the Soviet government in the position of having to carry out its threat to sign a peace treaty with East Germany. The West should leave the USSR in no doubt that any interference with the status of Berlin would provoke a grave international crisis.

In general we should like to see this section recognize that, while Soviet hostility and the struggle with the West continues, the present Russian government has accepted some limitation on the use of force, even though this has become a source of conflict with its major ally. This limitation is something of which the West can approve. The difficulty which it creates for Khrushchev should be noted: he heads a government and a world movement dedicated to overthrow the Western world; his government has the power to inflict enormous damage on the West, albeit at great cost to the Soviet Union. In the process of trying to formulate a policy in what is basically an unstable situation, Khrushchev's room for manoeuvre is confirmed. Carefully prepared Summit meetings and the more normal methods of diplomatic intercourse may serve to reduce the danger of a test of arms. Providing the West maintains its military strength and political unity, there is no danger in treating with the Soviet leaders. Continuing contact will provide the opportunities to remind the Soviet leaders that the West will not give way before threats or force.

NATO LONG-TERM PLANNING — ATOMIC QUESTIONS

General Norstad's views, as reported in my reference telegram, require further comments particularly in the light of possible developments during next few weeks. So as to deviate as little as possible from SACEUR's own thinking, the divisions he set will be maintained. NATO may be faced with the following alternatives or contradictory programmes:

Norstad's Proposals: Nuclear weapon would remain in place in Europe for the life of the North Atlantic Treaty and fall under some form of NATO control.

Gates' Proposals: The USA would co-operate with NATO countries in providing them with MRBMs land-based in Europe.

Bowie's Proposals: A strategic deterrent for NATO would be set up, likely to fall under some form of NATO control, consisting at least at the beginning of USA-built Polaris submarines.

German Proposals: Mr. Reid (his telegram 542 November 7† paragraph 2) refers to "a definite proposal" which the German government would have in mind for an atomic striking force. This force would consist of tactical nuclear weapons and fall under the control of some regional authority within NATO.

De Gaulle's Decision: The creation of an autonomous striking force to remain under the sole jurisdiction of the French government.

2. The three proposals originating in the USA have a certain number of features in common:

(a) In the Bowie proposals emphasis in placed on the fact that its adoption would lead to the setting up of a "strategic deterrent" for NATO. There is nothing new in this and the Norstad and Gates proposals could be given the same interpretation. The provision of a certain number of MRBMs to SACEUR's command automatically places his forces on a different plane.

(b) The novel view that one of the most important bi-products of a NATO atomic striking force might be to reduce rather than increase the number of atomic powers by giving the UK and France a way out of their present atomic quandary while preventing the spread to Germany. (This is particularly important at this time in the light of the Minister's statement on disarmament[67] (Candel New York 2183);† of the fifteen countries that will have the capacity to join the nuclear club in a very short time, at least half a dozen are members of NATO. Hence the importance of adopting joint policies).

(c) There is general agreement that NATO should be given additional responsibility over the control of use of atomic warheads. There is an implicit admission here that the present standard practice whereby the USA retains control or negotiates bilateral agreements is no repeat no longer practicable and that some new formula must be found. It is recognized at the same time that such a formula will be extremely difficult to find. In this respect the following comments may be worthwhile.

(i) According to Bonn's telegram 538 November 4† Mr. Strauss, while agreeing that "it was essential to find some method of political control over the use of nuclear weapons," thought that this lay somewhere between the existing system and a system under which the use of nuclear weapons required the consent of all the NATO governments. A passing reference by General Norstad and a vague comment by Mr. Spaak made to me in the course of last few days lead me to believe that the idea of a control by a certain number of NATO countries is in the air. The UK press generally has stumbled over the same difficulty and has been unable to agree that there be "fifteen fingers on the trigger."

(ii) This question has such far-reaching implications that, as far as we can see, no repeat no government, except possibly that of General de Gaulle, is committed to any specific formula yet. In private conversations, representatives of smaller countries take it that their governments would reject any formula of group control which would exclude them. In this respect the smaller countries of NATO seem to prefer the present formula whereby the President of the USA retains complete control initially of the release of atomic warheads for use to any intermediary formula.

3. In summary, the position seems to be that SACEUR, Gates and Bowie are generally agreed that NATO should be given a stronger deterrent (IRBMs) during the 60s although no repeat no decision seems to have been taken by the Administration as to the specific type and quantity of weapons which would be needed for that purpose, and that NATO should assume some responsibility over the control of such weapons; the German Minister of National Defence on the other hand restricts his comments to a tactical atomic force (already in being as far as the USA is concerned and in training for most countries with troops stationed in West Germany) and the President of the French Republic has decided "to go it alone."

4. I take it that the distinction between tactical and strategic nuclear weapons no repeat no longer exists in fact. SACEUR's views in this regard are quite definite. If such a distinction still exists "it is all in the mind" and not repeat not in the weapons. Mr. Strauss' suggestions have therefore become impossible to implement. I also take it that the French decision to go it alone is unacceptable from the Canadian point of view. We are therefore left to consider the three so-called USA proposals of Messrs. Norstad, Gates and Bowie.

5. When MC/70 was adopted[68] all NATO countries have implicitly accepted that MRBMs would in due course form part of the arsenal required for the defence of Western Europe. In his total force requirements for the air force SACEUR in 1958 already stated a requirement of eight squadrons of surface to surface (1500 mile range) missiles for 1960. The implementation of this policy raises questions of the dissemination of such missiles, the control over the warheads and the timing of the presentation of the programme. My personal views on these points are as follows:

(a) Dissemination: The spread of atomic weapons under national control should be prevented. The McMahon Act[69] has not repeat not prevented the USSR, the UK and France from developing their own programmes. Other countries are likely to follow suit. We are therefore on the border of atomic anarchy. It is unrealistic to think that a disarmament agreement will be reached in time to prevent such dissemination. Even if one were reached with Moscow it would not repeat not necessarily bind Communist China. The West should therefore try and put its own house in order. NATO could have an important role to play in this field; by becoming an atomic power in its own right national programmes within NATO, particularly those of the UK and France, could be absorbed progressively in this multilateral approach. West Germany under such circumstances, would not repeat not feel isolated nor obliged for national reasons, in due course, to develop its own programme. In the process the West, inter se, would develop techniques of control which could prove useful in disarmament discussion.

(b) Control: Ultimate control of the use of atomic warheads must rest with each NATO government. Through the process of consultation in Council, however, national authorities should remain in permanent and close touch with one another.

If therefore NATO governments are kept fully informed, there is a better likelihood that they will act in concert than would otherwise be the case. Such consultation would become even more important in the event that the control of atomic warheads would in certain circumstances rest with NATO. It may be recalled that the meetings of consultation between Ottawa and Washington were set up some years ago or so with the specific objective of permitting both governments to exchange views on the possible use of atomic weapons. The formula suggested here is merely an extension to the Fifteen of a type of consultation which has already been going on between Ottawa and the USA for some time. This new intimacy between the Fifteen has now become necessary. If this formula is retained, a more rapid and more secure system of communications will have to be set up between delegates to NATO and their respective authorities; it may also be that permanent delegates will have better to co-ordinate their work with the military authorities. Whatever way, however, this problem of control is envisaged, it appears clear to me that we should firmly oppose the setting up of any restricted committee of NATO which is to be held responsible for the atomic policy of the Alliance.

(c) Timing: From here it is impossible to know definitely whether or not repeat not the USA is to make an offer in this field at the forthcoming Ministerial meeting in December. On the whole, the International Staff is inclined to think that this matter will be postponed until the spring ministerial meeting; on the other hand, items appearing in the press here give us the impression that negotiations between the Administration and the President-elect have reached the stage where the matter may be ripe for consideration next month. If a definite proposal is made, there will be a strong temptation to suggest that with such little warning the subject matter should not repeat not have been raised. In my view, if an offer is made by the USA it should be examined very seriously either in Council at ministerial level or later by the Council in Permanent Session. Developments in the field of atomic policy are ripe for consideration as has been made clear of late in the UK, in France and West Germany.

NATO REVIEW OF SOVIET POLICY

Your most useful comments on my paper and Secretariat draft arrived in course of first days meeting. I had already submitted my draft of introduction because French had circulated a new version of their own. Although there was considerable sympathy for our draft, Germans and Americans strongly supported French draft which was accepted as basis for discussion. In fact, many of the ideas and indeed whole paragraphs from our draft were incorporated into French paper making result slightly indigestible. Many representatives, including German and American, later said they regretted not repeat not having used our paper.

2. Nearly all amendments proposed by you have been incorporated into final paper except for question of motives for break-up of summit. I gave your reasons for thinking some explanation should go into this study and outlined your arguments. There was strong opposition from Big Four plus Dutch, Belgians and Turks to inclusion of any attempt at explanation of reasons for Summit failure. I said I thought this would make the paper a curiously incomplete study of Soviet policy for the period under review but I was unable to secure a reversal of committee's decision. Nevertheless I think it was useful to outline your reasoning on this subject and it had some effect on the conclusions in the rest of study.

3. As regards your suggested general conclusions, I think you will find they are included implicitly in various parts of the paper though perhaps not repeat not spelled out as clearly as you might have preferred.

4. The important point is that Bohlen thesis was generally accepted and that following ideas are in the paper:

(a) reasons for the oscillations in Soviet policy are not repeat not due solely to Soviet tactical manoeuvres

(b) that they are dictated to a large extent by conditions within Soviet bloc and conflicting aims

(c) that they are in turn limited in one direction by Soviet recognition of risk of nuclear war, in the other by dangers to unity of Soviet bloc

(d) that they are normal and should not repeat not overly excite us; and

(e) that it seems likely that USSR will make a new effort to recreate the conditions necessary for renewed East-West negotiations.

5. Perhaps the most heated argument was over my suggestion that the section on East-West negotiations should conclude with following paragraphs: "It should also be decided whether the alternative to negotiations is palatable. A carefully prepared Summit and more normal diplomatic intercourse may serve to reduce danger of a test of arms. Providing the West maintains its military strength and political unity, there is not repeat not necessarily any danger in treating with Soviet leaders, and continuing contact will provide opportunities to remind Soviet leaders that the West will not repeat not give way before threats or force, particularly at a time when Russians seem to have accepted some limitations on use of force, though their basic hostility to the West has not repeat not abated. It is also of fundamental importance that the West should not repeat not allow itself to be forced into accepting the blame either for blocking the holding of a Summit Conference, or for its breakdown if this were to occur." This was supported by British, Danes and Norwegians but proved unacceptable to others. Some of the ideas are however now lodged in the rest of the text.

6. I did not repeat not suggest that this passage be left in as an alternative reading because feeling was strongly in favour of a unanimous text and most representatives had been very co-operative in making necessary compromises. Everyone was agreed that the final paper has real substance and that it would have been a mistake to present two separate sets of conclusions to ministers.

7. More detailed comments plus agreed version of general introduction follow by bag.

NATO LONG-TERM PLANNING — USA MILITARY PROPOSALS

In the course of a long talk today with Livingston Merchant, Deputy Under Secretary for Political Affairs, over a wide range of topics he gave us in confidence a very helpful forecast of the kind of USA proposals in the military field which we along with other NATO governments, will be receiving formally two or at least one week before the NATO Ministerial meeting.

2. Merchant began by linking these proposals to earlier NATO discussions which go back to the 1957 Heads of Government meeting and to significant statements made at the time by the President and the Secretary of State dealing with a nuclear capability for NATO.[70] He referred also to the Gates' proposals dating from last April in which USA indicated its desire to cooperate with NATO countries in providing them with MRBMs land based in Europe. Insofar as the Gates' proposals referred to joint measures to be undertaken with certain European governments for the manufacture of launching mechanisms, these proposals had not repeat not got off the ground. Over the past year, the various USA government agencies concerned had been giving careful thought to the NATO military problem and had tried to take into account various currents of opinion including the following: the concern expressed by some European governments and in some sections of public opinion as to whether there should be agreement on a NATO nuclear strategy when there was no repeat no guarantee that the nuclear weapons themselves would remain in Europe; the question of providing for a wider distribution of authority and control over the use of such weapons; the French position which placed its emphasis on national effort and national control, which in turn brought with it the danger that other governments (notably the Germans) might feel impelled to adopt a similar posture; and finally, the deep concern of USA and other governments about the dangers of proliferation of the atomic capability operating under national controls (you will note that these concerns have already been reflected in the very useful telegrams from our delegate in Paris on this subject).

3. Against this background, Merchant indicated that USA intended to propose a discussion of NATO nuclear questions at the forthcoming Ministerial meeting in Paris. He added that it was hoped that before the meeting the State Department planned to circulate to the NATO governments an outline of its proposals for subsequent discussion in restricted session at the Ministerial meeting. The proposals which would be put forward were contingent upon amendments to existing USA legislation and would also call for consultations with the incoming administration. However, since steps were being taken to consult on a bi-partisan basis with the key congressional committees, including the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Armed Services and the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Merchant did not repeat not anticipate that there would be any major roadblock in the path of presenting these proposals in the way he had outlined. It would, however, be clear that administrative action on the proposals could only be taken after the new administration settles in in January.

4. The proposals had three principal aspects: (1) an undertaking to maintain NATO nuclear weapons stockpiles at the level of NATO military requirements for the period of life of the North Atlantic Treaty; (2) a plan for USA to commit to NATO five Polaris submarines by the end of 1963, which would be assigned by USA in the same way as the Sixth Fleet and which, within NATO, would operate under USA control; (3) a proposal that NATO should establish a multilateral MRBM force operating as a NATO force on the basis of joint control by the North Atlantic Treaty powers. If there should be agreement to establish such a force, this would be done by proposing that the other NATO partners of USA acquire and contribute one hundred Polaris missiles and launching platforms to operate under the joint authority of NATO.

[70] Voir/See "Texts of Speeches Given by Eisenhower and Dulles at NATO Meeting in Paris," New York Times, December 17, 1957, p. 12.

Merchant said that USA preference would be for their seaborne deployment, but other possibilities could also be considered. In the event that such a NATO force were established, USA would then be prepared to turn over the five Polaris submarines and their (80) missiles referred to under (2) above. It is contemplated that the NATO force would be internationally (i.e. NATO) staffed and that the control of use of these weapons would be the subject of collective arrangements to be worked out by the NATO allies. It was also hoped that the existing bilateral arrangements under which Thor and Jupiter missiles are stationed in Turkey, Italy and UK would eventually be assimilated to the integrated NATO nuclear force contemplated.

5. While there was inadequate time to raise questions of procedure and of detail (this can be done when the concrete proposals are available in more specific form), it is our impression that the changes in USA legislation to which Merchant referred, and which would be required to implement proposals of this nature, would not repeat not relate to custody of the warheads, but would be related to the consequential measures that would arise in providing for the novel concept of a NATO MRBM force operating under a collective NATO control.

6. I am sure that you will safeguard the foregoing carefully. The formal proposals may be available to us and to our delegation in NATO about the beginning of December.

NATO LONG-TERM PLANNING — ATOMIC QUESTIONS

I called on Secretary-General yesterday to get his impressions on his visit to Washington. He was satisfied with the plans that had been made although naturally he would have been pleased to meet President-elect Kennedy but was delighted at the forthright and positive approach taken by the present administration on atomic questions. (Mr. Spaak must have been given the same forecast as Mr. Heeney since he referred to these three different aspects of USA proposals).

2. As regards procedure Mr. Spaak (confirming info of Washington telegram 2933 November 25) takes it that USA will circulate proposals during next few days which will form the basis of discussion at forthcoming Ministerial meeting. Mr. Herter told him that he was determined to go ahead not repeat not only as a result of the soundings taken of the different key congressional committees but more particularly because the State Department was now convinced of the inherent soundness of the programme to be submitted to its allies. Messrs Bruce and Nitze had been much more careful however and had made it clear to Secretary-General that they could not repeat not commit Senator Kennedy to any given course of action prior to his taking over in January.

3. When questioned as to the likely reactions of other NATO countries Mr. Spaak expressed the view that the great majority would welcome the initiative taken by Washington. This certainly applied to West Germany, Italy, Greece, Turkey, Belgium and Netherlands; possibly also to Norway and Denmark in view of the fact that their special position on atomic matters would be met since most of the MRBMs would be seaborne. He was puzzled by the attitude of UK where the press "because of its strong anti-German slant" was showing opposition to the project and the government was rather cool to it. In the end he expected that UK authorities would be forthcoming if and when they got some clearer indication that President elect Kennedy was generally favourable to the programme as a whole. He hoped that Canada would not repeat not oppose a discussion of the proposals. He then added "once again we will be left with the enigma of France." He had been in touch with Mr. Messmer who had shown interest but had remained non-committal. One point made by Mr. Messmer was that French would not repeat not be able financially to contribute to the acquisition of Polaris missiles for NATO pool and at the same time continue to finance their national programme. On the other hand the Minister of the Armed Forces had readily recognized the advantages there would be in agreeing to a formula which would at the same time prevent Germans from developing a national programme and provide their forces with the required MRBMs under NATO control. In his discussion with Mr. Messmer the Secretary-General related USA proposals to General de Gaulle's stand on global consultations and underlined the fact that if NATO were to become "a nuclear power" USA would be compelled to consult with its allies on all issues which could in due course lead to the use of atomic weapons. Hence General de Gaulle would have achieved one of his objectives.

4. The Secretary-General realized that the question of control over the use of warheads would loom large during the discussions, he did not repeat not expect that a mutually satisfactory formula could be devised during the forthcoming meetings. The intention of Mr. Herter was to leave this question for the Council to decide. This naturally would apply only to those MRBMs falling under the joint authority of NATO.

5. On the whole Mr. Spaak is cautiously optimistic. He believes that the Council will give a fair hearing to USA proposals and that in due course all members of the Alliance will come to realize the importance of the offer. He does not repeat not expect rapid developments however nor is he likely to press for any decision at the Ministerial meeting although his position will partly at least be conditioned by the proposals themselves.

6. We will try and gather further info from other delegates during the next few days but this may prove difficult until USA delegate has formally circulated its proposals.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — TENTATIVE ASSESSMENT

We shall attempt in this telegram to answer your request for an assessment of the likely course of developments at the Ministerial meeting, bearing constantly in mind the difficulty of assessing with any accuracy the course of a Ministerial meeting which is so subject to unusual developments in the international situation at the actual time of the meeting and which this year, of course, will assemble with "lame duck" American representation. Two other important meetings this year will precede the NATO Ministerial meeting and will have some effect on it; this effect however is most difficult to predict at this point in time. The meetings are those which de Gaulle will have with Adenauer alone and with the representatives of the Six early in December, and the meeting of ministers to give final attention to the OECD Convention. Developments at the UN could also have a bearing on the attitude of certain countries.

2. Before commenting on the individual items on the ministerial agenda, we should like to record a number of general impressions of the likely nature of the Ministerial meeting which can only be given the value of very tentative estimates at this stage.

3. First, it seems to us as indicated in Washington's telegram 2933 November 25 that certain proposals affecting NATO nuclear policy will be made by USA and that the question of a possible NATO-controlled nuclear force will dominate the discussion, both privately and in the interest which the press will have in the subject. While it seems clear to us that no repeat no decisions can be taken on this subject (and indeed it seems unlikely that decisions will be requested beyond reference of the subject to the Permanent Council for further study), a good deal of attention may have to be given to that part of the communiqué which will deal with the discussion. You already have, we believe, as clear an idea of the likely USA proposals as it is possible to obtain short of the actual USA proposals in writing which we expect may be circulated by early next week. As indicated above, we do not repeat not believe that Canadian ministers or their colleagues from other NATO countries will be expected to give definitive views of their governments on the idea of a NATO-controlled nuclear force but it is most likely that several ministers will support such developments. On the other hand, the ministerial discussion will set the tone for later discussion by the Permanent Council of USA proposal. Some tentative views at least, therefore, of individual government positions would seem desirable. It is not repeat not clear to us at this stage under what heading of the agenda USA proposals would be made. They could come either under "long-range planning" or "military problems." We shall have to wait for their presentation to Council to clarify this procedural point.

4. The second general comment concerns NATO long-range planning. Here again we believe the press will be particularly interested and here again it seems to us the reference in the communiqué will be important. We will deal at greater length with this subject below.

5. At this moment, the review which ministers will make of the international situation would not repeat not seem likely to produce difficulties. This comment must however be hedged about with a good many limitations. Certainly the discussion could be dramatically affected by such things as (1) the results of the Communist Summit meeting in Moscow; (2) unexpected developments at the UN; (3) developments in Far East, particularly in Laos; and (4) the Congo situation.

6. It is our impression on economic questions that ministers who have just come from signing the OECD Convention will not repeat not think it particularly valuable to deal at any length with the recurrent theme of NATO's economic content. We suspect that if the Secretary-General attempts to spark a discussion along this line, the tendency of ministers will be to refer to the action which they have just taken in the signing of a most comprehensive economic agreement of great importance to Europe and of particular significance in the link which is established in the economic field with North America.

7. Finally, we are inclined to believe that the Council's examination of what might be called the more routine military problems of the Alliance is likely to be somewhat routine with the possible exception of German desire for progress under the general heading of "logistics in peace and war." Something more will be said on this below but our general impression is that ministers will look forward to the new triennial review process which is to be begun in 1961 as a more meaningful review exercise than the annual review of 1960. That triennial review process presupposes a new version of the military requirements for the years ahead. Certainly it is the hope, perhaps unfounded, that the new version of MC 70 will be somewhat more successful than its predecessor in reconciling NATO military requirements with the financial, economic and productive resources which governments are willing to make available.

8. We would now deal specifically with the main items of the agenda.

I – Review of the International Situation

9. The agenda provides for a review of Soviet policy since the Summit set-back and for a review of developments in four geographical areas: Eastern Europe and Eastern Germany; Africa; Middle East; and the Far East. As far as we have been able to ascertain, the report of the Soviet experts contains nothing startling except perhaps in its surprising degree of agreement. It is nevertheless not repeat not possible to be confident that this paper will remain uncontentious because we still do not repeat not know the outcome of the Communist Party Conference in Moscow which began three weeks ago. The final communiqué from this conference, or if there is no repeat no communiqué, the earliest actions flowing from decisions taken at it, might cause further debate on the whole subject or might appear to make it necessary to reassess some of the conclusions in the paper. It is difficult to see ministers do more than simply direct that such a re-assessment take place. The paper on Eastern Europe does not repeat not seem to be likely to provoke much debate either except for one point covered in paragraph 12 below.

10. Of the papers concerning areas not repeat not the immediate concern of NATO, those on Africa and Far East might spark debate. As you will be aware from recent reports of proceedings in Council, Mr. Spaak has developed certain very firm opinions about black Africa, neutrals, UN, and the obligations of NATO solidarity. It would not repeat not be surprising to see these opinions come out either on his initiatives or M. Wigny's. The basic thesis is that newly-emerged and neutral countries should not repeat not be allowed to push the NATO Alliance or its members around, and that members who have problems in this respect have the right to consult NATO about them, and to receive comment and (ultimately) support in accordance with generally agreed positions. We do not repeat not expect this point to arise directly in the paper on Africa (which we have not repeat not seen yet because we were not repeat not represented on the working group of experts), but it would be a not repeat not unnatural development from Beligan preoccupations in the Congo.

11. Far Eastern paper is not repeat not of itself likely to give rise to debate, although it is worth noting that it contains one of the few records of dissenting opinion, and this in relation to Laos. It is however conceivable that the rapid deterioration of the situation in Laos could create a desire for discussion of NATOs relationships with CENTO and SEATO. Middle Eastern paper and the situation in the Middle East do not repeat not at the moment seem to present valid cause to take up much of minister's time.

12. There is one topic which is not repeat not specifically covered by the papers coming before the Ministerial meeting but which could be brought up under Eastern European paper. This topic relates to the division of Germany. It has been brought up in recent meetings and is clearly the principal preoccupation of German authorities. There has been extensive discussion of detailed measures related to discouraging further Soviet encroachments within the normal consultative machinery of NATO. While we should not repeat not expect detailed consideration of these measures, there is likely to be a plea from Germany or USA for a firm and united front to discourage further erosion of Western position in Berlin.

II – NATO Long-range Planning

13. We expect to receive the Secretary-General's progress report on long-range planning by early next week. It will be the basis for discussion of this agenda item. Whether or not repeat not the USA proposals with respect to NATO's nuclear policy are discussed under this heading will be of some importance; if they are, discussion of the other items under long-range planning may be less significant. In any case, the Secretary-General's progress report will touch on the other five items under long-range planning. We have been able to make preliminary soundings with the staff on the nature of Spaak's progress report and understand that, as drafted by the staff so far, it is not repeat not exciting. Spaak of course can give it more of the spice of his own personal views but we are inclined to doubt that he will.

14. It is our understanding that on political consultation, the draft as it presently stands is more representative of the gradualist school of thought than of the more revolutionary ideas of the Secretary-General himself. For example, we understand that it will reflect the consensus that there must be discussion of matters of concern to NATO which develop outside the Treaty area but will not repeat not over-emphasize the need for concerted policies on such matters. It will reflect the caution of most members to avoid extending their government's commitments beyond the Treaty area. We have been given to understand that this section of the paper will reflect fairly accurately both the consensus reached in the series of long-term planning meetings and the differences of view expressed. We hope from our reports of this series of meetings you have adequate material on which to base your briefing of ministers. We understand that where there was no repeat no consensus, e.g., on the establishment of standing committees for certain areas, the Secretary-General's progress report will revert to the technique of questions as to whether something more should not repeat not be done in this or that field.

15. We understand that the economic section of the report will rely heavily on the Stikker memo in an attempt to reflect the thinking of members of the Alliance in this field.[71] As we have indicated above, we are inclined to estimate that no repeat no matter what the progress report says, the discussion will be affected by the experience of ministers at the OECD meeting. The one theme which may be given prominence however will be the importance of NATOs interest in aid to under-developed countries, and particularly in aid and assistance to the under-developed members of the Alliance.

16. NFO problems will be given some attention but the lack of adequate discussion of these problems by the long-range planning group has limited the ability of the staff to indicate much progress. It certainly can be assumed that, if time permits, a good deal will be hear about psychological action from Germans and from a number of other interested delegates.

17. We have been given to understand that the section on science problems will reflect the discussion which was based on our contribution. That is not repeat not to say however that our ideas will be accepted. We can do little more at this stage than refer you to our telegrams 2889† and 2890 November 8† by way of a general indication of the nature of the progress report on this subject.

18. Finally, there will be a brief section on civil emergency planning which, we understand, to a large degree will be influenced by Dutch paper on this subject (our telegram 2994

[71] Voir/See Dirk U. Stikker, Men of Responsibility: A Memoir (New York: Harper & Row, 1965), pp. 330-35, 396-400.

November 16)† and by the account of the informal meeting of the senior committee given by Coleridge and reported in our telegram 3078 November 24.†

III – Military Problems

19. Insofar as the third item on the agenda is concerned, we have already made a number of general comments above. Addressing ourselves specifically now to the annual review process just completed, we would say that, in general terms, economic considerations rather than military dominated this year's annual review. Of particular importance in this respect was the consistent USA argument that there had to be a good deal more self-help evident in Europe if USA mutual aid was to be continued. USA concern with their balance of payments position was made equally evident in the course of the individual examinations. We have reported USA arguments in some detail and need not repeat not give any further outline of them here. The question of progress towards integrated logistics is bound to be made to have ministers authorize the establishment of a mixed working group along the lines of that described in document AC/19-D/218. We expect that the report on co-operation in research, development and production is likely to be simply a progress report which would not repeat not necessarily give rise to extensive discussion. You have already had from us a fairly recent appreciation of progress in this field. Finally, it is uncertain at this stage whether cost-sharing related to the new infrastructure programme will appear on the agenda. Once again, the main outlines of the problem are well-known to you. It does not repeat not seem likely to us that any agreement will have been reached between USA, Germany, France and UK on a redistribution of the cost-sharing before the Ministerial meeting.

20. There is no repeat no indication as yet that any member of the Council or the staff will raise anything under "any other business."

Memorandum from Office of Adviser to Government on Disarmament to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL New York, December 5, 1960

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, DECEMBER 16, 1960
NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR NATO, AND DISARMAMENT

Telegram No. 3177 of December 1, 1960† from NATO Paris raises the question of whether you should raise the subject of disarmament at the forthcoming ministerial NATO meeting. A number of other messages, in particular NATO Paris No. 3048 of November 22, 1960† and WASHDC No. 2984 of December 2, 1960,† have drawn attention to the fact that the USA may put forward certain proposals for providing NATO, either as a group, or the NATO nations separately, with nuclear weapons. There is also the question of whether the Royal Canadian Air Force in Europe should be equipped with F-104 Gs — an aircraft which has no other purpose than to serve as a vehicle for a nuclear warhead; and whether the Canadian Army in Europe should be equipped with the Honest John rockets — a short-range nuclear vehicle.

2. I have argued in another paper[72] that any spreading of nuclear arms in NATO would be to go in a direction contrary to disarmament, and would therefore be undesirable if our long-range policy is that only through disarmament can Canada really find peace and security in the nuclear age. In the present paper I propose to set forth arguments of a military-political nature against the adoption of either of the courses of action mentioned in paragraph 1 above.

3. It has been argued, I believe, that the Canadian forces in Europe, for their own effectiveness and security, should be equipped with the means of delivering nuclear warheads referred to above. General Norstad has recently made it clear to the visiting Parliamentarians that the warheads, without which the vehicles are useless, are held and will continue to be held in the custody of the USA. General Norstad also stated that the decision to use the nuclear arms would be made at a "high level"; presumably meaning at a level higher than that of the Canadian commander of the troops or air force units concerned. That would mean that the decision would have to be made by a USA officer, since the warheads are held in US custody. It is therefore possible that the Canadian army formation might find themselves engaged in fighting in which their commander might consider it essential that the nuclear weapons should be used, but permission would be refused.

4. Why might permission be refused? Because it is most probable that the initial use of nuclear weapons, on the "tactical" level, will result, through the "escalator" principle, in the more powerful kinds of nuclear weapons being brought into use, and very rapidly. No military man, or professorial so-called expert has, so far as I know, given any convincing reason why this "escalator" effect should not take place; no one has demonstrated that there can be any such take place; no one has demonstrated that there can be any such thing as restricted nuclear warfare. Hence, once the nuclear weapon is used at all, its use will in all probability be unlimited.

5. Conditions are different now to what they were when the decision to equip NATO with nuclear arms was taken in 1957. That was before the USSR had shown its ability to make ICBM's which could hit targets in the United States. Now, hardly anyone doubts that the USSR has so many of them that it could cause terrific destruction and loss of life in the continental United States, and there is nothing the USA can do to stop this — except the deterrent provided by the ability of her own nuclear carriers to mete out similar or greater destruction in Russia. What nearly every European thinker on the subject now doubts, is whether the USA would take the decision to initiate nuclear warfare to stop an aggression in Europe by the USSR with conventional forces. A decision to retaliate with nuclear weapons, previously seen in the context of a decision to unleash the United States Strategic Air Command, which requires the authority of the President of the United States, would seem now to be required before the "tactical" nuclear weapons with which certain forces in NATO have been equipped could be used; that is, before the warheads for these vehicles could be released from United States custody. Does it make sense to equip a Canadian brigade with a weapon — a so-called tactical weapon — which requires the authority of the President of the United States for its use?

6. The same considerations apply generally in the case of the RCAF Division. Unless it were authorized to receive the nuclear warheads — bombs — the F 104 G aircraft is designed to deliver, it would have no combat usefulness at all; except perhaps in a reconnaissance rôle for which cheaper aircraft would be equally useful. General Norstad expects the rôle of light bombers or fighter-bombers to be taken over the MRBM's beginning 1963. Is it desirable for Canada to equip her air component with an aircraft which will be obsolete in a few years or which perhaps, if an emergency arises, may never receive the nuclear bombs it is designed to deliver?

7. There is a further consideration against equipping the Canadian forces with these vehicles for the delivery of nuclear weapons. That is, if a situation threatening war should develop, and the Russians knew that the Canadian brigade and the RCAF division were equipped with nuclear weapons, would our forces not become a selected target for medium-range nuclear-headed Russian rockets? Thus, equipping the Canadian forces with these weapons would reduce their security, not add to it. We should be giving them a short-range delivery system for nuclear weapons, and rendering them priority targets for Russian nuclear rockets of much longer range. This is not equalizing their equipment with that of the prospective enemy.

8. For these several reasons, I believe that the Canadian Government should reconsider its previous decision (if such a decision has indeed been taken) to obtain the nuclear delivery vehicles mentioned above. On the other hand, the opinion is growing in many of the NATO nations that there is a real need to strengthen NATO's conventionally-armed forces. Canada might compensate for her refusal to accept nuclear arms by offering to increase moderately her contribution in land and air forces, equipped with modern conventional weapons.

9. The matter of a separate NATO deterrent force would seem to be less urgent, and also of less direct interest to Canada. However, it may be discussed at the Ministerial meeting, and could be of importance in the context of disarmament. There are several questions which suggest themselves in this connection.

10. If the USA handed over to NATO a quantity of nuclear weapons, and their vehicles, it would let the decision to initiate nuclear warfare in Europe pass out of US hands. This might reassure Europeans who now fear that the USA would not use their nuclear deterrent in response to a USSR threat to Europe's vital interests or territory, for fear of the destruction which the USSR ICBM's could cause in the USA. However, the Americans must think, before handing over a "nuclear capability" on any large scale to the control of NATO, whether if a nuclear war were initiated in Europe, would the Russians confine their riposte to European targets? Might the Russians not reason that even if they could practically destroy Europe, the damage they would themselves suffer would be such that afterwards, the USA, with its nuclear striking capacity intact, could destroy the rest of Russia while suffering relatively little damage itself? In such a case, would the USSR not be likely to begin any nuclear war by concentrating on destroying USA nuclear striking power, or as much of it as they could, devoting a relatively minor part of their effort to European targets? With this possibility, would it not be very dangerous for the Americans to let the decision to employ the nuclear arm pass out of their control?

11. Apart from this difficulty, there is also a great difficulty in devising a method of organizing a command for a NATO nuclear striking or deterrent force. When decisions to use such a force have to be taken in a matter of minutes, committee decisions by majority are out of the question. Would the NATO nations be able to agree on a commander for such a deterrent force whom all could trust to do the right think in the decisive moment, and not think more of the interest of the country to which he happened to belong than of the interests of other member countries? The problem seems almost insoluble. Yet the present situation of relying on the US-controlled deterrent is unsatisfactory, and seems likely to become more so.

12. This dilemma may open the door to a proposal to examine once more the possibilities of making a nuclear-free zone in Europe, or wider extent than has previously been considered. Such an item, in connection with protection against surprise attack, was discussed in general terms between the five Western members of the Ten-Nation Disarmament Committee in elaborating the disarmament plan which they drew up and presented in Geneva on March 16, 1960.

13. The NATO military authorities might be called upon to study and make a plan for freeing Europe of nuclear arms, in the content of a general disarmament plan; with, of course, all the indispensable measures of control and verification. At the same time, they might study the problem of the composition and control of nuclear arms could be halted, pending the outcome of the next and serious disarmament negotiations between West and East.

CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE — DND MEMORANDUM ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

In accordance with your request the following brief has been prepared for your use in speaking to the DND memorandum entitled "Nuclear Weapons for NATO and NORAD Forces."†

A. General Observations

1. At a time when Western Governments generally, and Canada in particular, have been urging in the United Nations that every effort should be made to get disarmament discussions going again, certain NATO sources have been undermining this position by conveying the impression that the December Ministerial Meeting is to be a "grand atomic occasion" involving consideration of procedures to facilitate the spread-out of atomic weapons and to make their use easier. If, as we expect, the Canadian resolution on disarmament is approved by the General Assembly next week, it would be inconsistent and hypocritical for us at the same time to adopt policies which can only have the effect of compounding the nuclear problem.

2. The Prime Minister, in his recent speech to the Canadian Club[73] stated that "we have taken the stand that no decision will be required while progress towards disarmament continues. To do otherwise would be inconsistent." The proposals contained in the DND memorandum, in my judgment, are diametrically opposed to this statement of policy.

3. It is evident that one of the first tasks of the new United States Administration will be to seek to reach a détente with the U.S.S.R. It will be necessary for these two governments to recognize the over-riding mutual areas of interest in disarmament and to bargain on this basis. In my view we must resist at this time any initiatives, either in NATO or bilaterally between Canada and the United States which might hamper these developments.

B. U.S. Proposals at NATO Ministerial Meeting

According to the information given to Mr. Heeney by Mr. Merchant, the U.S.A. proposals to be submitted to the Council have three principal aspects:

(a) an undertaking (by the United States) to maintain NATO nuclear weapons stockpiles at the level of NATO military requirements for the period of life of the North Atlantic Treaty;

(b) the United States would commit to NATO five Polaris submarines by the end of 1963 which would be assigned in the same way as the Sixth Fleet and which would operate (within NATO) under U.S.A. control;

(c) a proposal that NATO should establish a multilateral MRBM force operating as a NATO force on the basis of joint control by the North Atlantic Treaty members. If there should be agreement to establish such a force this would be done by proposing that the other NATO partners of the United States acquire and contribute one hundred Polaris missiles and launching platforms to operate under the joint authority of NATO. (The U.S.A. would prefer seaborne deployment but other possibilities could also be considered).

In the event such a force under (c) were established the United States would then be prepared to turn over the five Polaris submarines and their 80 missiles referred to under (b). It is contemplated that the NATO force would be internationally (i.e. NATO) staffed and the control of the use of these weapons would be the subject of collective arrangements worked out by the NATO allies. The U.S. also hopes that existing bilateral arrangements under which Thor and Jupiter (IRBM) missiles are stationed in the United Kingdom, Italy and Turkey would eventually be assimilated to the integrated NATO nuclear force contemplated.

2. Although it is not yet clear whether these proposals will be discussed under NATO Long Term Planning or during the consideration of NATO Military problems, it is interesting to note that the United States Permanent Representative on the Council, Mr. Burgess, has expressed the hope to Mr. Léger that atomic problems would not dominate the meeting. In his view the United States undertaking to maintain NATO nuclear weapons stockpiles in Europe, and the plan for the United States to commit Polaris submarines to NATO, should be considered as a follow-up of the 1957 Heads of Government decision regarding the establishment of nuclear stockpiles and IRBM's in Europe and "need not be played up." Mr. Burgess also indicated that these aspects of the United States proposals would not require amendments to existing legislation. When asked by Mr. Léger whether these two aspects constitute a unilateral decision on the part of the United States not requiring Council action, Mr. Burgess replied that the U.S. administration expected that the Council would "at least take note and preferably welcome" such developments. As far as the establishment of a NATO MRBM multilateral force was concerned, Mr. Burgess said he expected no decision would be taken at the forthcoming meeting. The idea would merely be launched and it would be up to the new U.S.A. Administration to decide whether to follow it up.

3. I do not believe the NATO Council should in any way indicate publicly its reaction to U.S. proposals submitted by an outgoing administration on a tentative basis and subject to re-examination by the new administration. No doubt the proposals will have to be discussed by the Council in a non-committal way, but the communiqué should make it clear that no decisions have been taken and that the NATO governments have not abandoned their sincere desire to settle outstanding differences by negotiations and especially to continue their efforts to come to an accommodation with the U.S.S.R. on disarmament.

C. Nuclear Weapons for Canadian Forces

1. Negotiation of agreements for acquisition of nuclear weapons, even on a contingent basis, carries with it an implication of ultimate intention to obtain the weapons. It is therefore contrary to the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister, as referred to above.

2. Inevitably, it would become known that such negotiations were in progress. To argue that the Government's policy remains what it has been for the past 18 months would not be tenable in the light of subsequent developments. It would be regarded by public opinion as inconsistent with recent statements by members of the Government and with the position taken by Canada in the United Nations.

D. Storage of Nuclear Air Defence Weapons in Canada for Use by U.S. Forces

Conclusion of the Goose-Harmon agreement at this time would have great symbolic importance because it would be the first agreement authorizing the storage of nuclear weapons on Canadian soil and would be generally interpreted as the prelude to the completion of arrangements for the acquisition of weapons for Canadian forces. In any case it would make it more difficult for the Government to justify its policy of deferring a decision on this latter issue.

NATO LONG TERM PLANNING

One important item on the agenda of the December NATO Ministerial meeting will be NATO Long Term Planning. The proposal that NATO should examine its problems and objectives in order to chart a course for the 1960's was originally made by the United States Secretary of State in December, 1959.[74] It has received full Canadian support and has been the subject of a series of informal discussions between the NATO Permanent Representatives during the past two months.

To date these discussions have dwelt almost exclusively on the political, economic, scientific and information problems and objectives. The views expressed reflect some measure of agreement in these fields. As yet, however, there has been no organized discussion of defence questions and it seems unlikely that there will be until such time as it is clear that the United States is in a position to reveal its views on this aspect of NATO co-operation, which is clearly the most controversial and sensitive especially insofar as it involves atomic policy.

The Canadian Representative has participated in these discussions which, to date, have not been regarded as formal expressions of national positions but rather as a preliminary exchange of views. One reason for this arrangement was that it would leave more room for manoeuvre and, more importantly, would reserve for Ministers the responsibility for expressing formally their national positions at the December Ministerial Meeting.

By way of providing preliminary guidance for our permanent representative and to clarify Canadian views, several interdepartmental meetings have been held during the past two months. The result of these meetings is reflected in the attached paper which outlines a suggested Canadian position in respect of the main aspects of NATO Long Term Planning which are likely to come up for discussion at the NATO Ministerial Meeting. It will be noted that the section on atomic policy merely records the current Canadian position; it does not attempt to suggest what Canadian policy should be. The whole problem, however, is under continuing study in the Departments directly concerned, especially in view of indications that the United States are re-examining their position.

I am in agreement with the main lines developed in this paper and I would recommend that the paper be approved as general guidance for the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming December Ministerial Meeting.

NATO LONG TERM PLANNING

Introduction

Although the study now being carried out in NATO has been referred to as the "preparation of a Ten Year Plan" this is really a misnomer. On the basis of Mr. Herter's original proposal it can more correctly be described as an attempt to identify the main problems which the Alliance is now facing and is likely to face during the next few years and to reach agreement on positive objectives towards which we should work in our mutual relations within NATO, in our relations with other free nations, and in our relations with the Communist powers. This paper is intended to highlight the Canadian position on the main problems. The assumption is made throughout that Canada will continue to give its full support to NATO and, until agreement is reached on controlled balanced disarmament, will continue to carry its share of the overall NATO defence effort, including the maintenance of forces in Europe as long as they are required there.

In order to deal systematically with NATO's main problems and activities the paper is divided into five sections as follows:

Section I — Political Section II — Defence
Section III — Economic Section IV — Information
Section V — Science

SECTION I

POLITICAL PROBLEMS

TERMS OF THE TREATY

Canadian Position

1. The terms of the Treaty are satisfactory to enable the Alliance to deal with the problems which are likely to arise in the future out of a changing international situation and a shifting Soviet challenge.

2. We would strongly oppose extending the scope of the Treaty on the grounds:

(i) that this would involve unacceptable additional military commitments,

(ii) such action would arouse sharp opposition and resentment by many of the countries outside the NATO area which already are suspicious of NATO's motives and objectives,

(iii) extension of NATO's scope of responsibilities would assume a degree of common interest shared by the NATO countries which does not exist,

(iv) experience has shown that other organizations such as the U.N. can be more effectively used for resolving many of the problems which arise in other areas.

Comment

Our view appears to be shared by the vast majority of NATO members. France would appear to be the only member which favours an extension of the area of NATO's commitments.

NATO MACHINERY

Canadian Position

1. The existing machinery on the non-military side of NATO's activities is satisfactory.

2. It is up to the members to use it properly by intensifying and improving the process of political consultation.

3. We would strongly oppose the formation of any political directorate in NATO or any arrangement which would be inconsistent with the accepted principle of equality of membership in the Alliance.

Comment

The only specific suggestion for a revision has come from the Secretary-General who has pressed for changing the existing ad hoc expert committees on Africa and the Middle East into permanent standing committees; so far this suggestion has received no support. General de Gaulle has spoken in general terms of the need for something to be organized "at least between the world powers of the West," ... "as to their political and eventually their strategic posture elsewhere than in Europe and particularly in the Middle East and Africa ...". This clearly suggests the idea of a tripartite directorate but so far the French representatives to NATO has not given the Council any clear definition of what the French leader has in mind.

POLITICAL CONSULTATION — PROBLEMS ARISING WITHIN THE AREA COVERED BY THE TREATY

Canadian Position

1. The future strength and solidarity of NATO will depend to a considerable extent on the willingness of the member countries to make a reality of political consultation in NATO on all problems of direct concern to the Alliance as a whole, where one of the main objectives is to reach as wide a measure of agreement as possible on a common approach. We believe that there is room for a good deal of improvement in this respect.

2. The practice adopted last spring where the NATO Council was in a sense the main coordinating agency for the preparation of the Western position at the Summit meeting should be continued. Since any future Summit meeting will be concerned inter alia with the unresolved problems arising out of World War II (i.e. the problems of Germany, Berlin and Germany's eastern frontier) these questions should be periodically re-examined in NATO in order to determine whether there is a need for more flexibility in the Western approach.

3. We recognize that in respect of some problems (such as certain aspects of the Berlin question) the three larger NATO powers have a requirement to consult closely together because of their special responsibilities. At the same time we believe that it is important that such consultations do not derogate from NATO consultations nor confront the other NATO members with decisions on matters of concern to them without prior consultation.

4. We view with considerable concern General de Gaulle's recent efforts to arrange top level formal consultations between the Six on political and defence questions[75] particularly insofar as such consultations could detract from the effectiveness of NATO discussions and lead to the formation of a European bloc within NATO.

Comment

Canadian views in respect of consultation are shared by most of the NATO members and it is particularly encouraging to note the lack of support in Europe for General de Gaulle's various suggestions for a directorate and for a formal top level consultative arrangement between the Six.

Recently, however, there have been signs that he has persuaded some of his European partners in the Six to agree to hold at least one top-level meeting in the near future. While we should continue to express our concern about such developments, which inevitably tend to create political groupings with pre-formed positions in NATO, it must be acknowledged that the trend of developments in Europe may bring more and more political content into the European Economic Community, whether we like it or not. The effect may well be to form a European bloc in NATO and this development may be hastened if some accommodation is reached between the U.K. and the Six in respect of U.K. participation in the Treaty of Rome. This is not to suggest that we should desist from striving to maintain the principle of equality of membership as the best arrangements but rather that we should not delude ourselves into thinking that political groupings in NATO will not come about in the long term.

The need for an improvement in consultation in NATO is shown by the incidents of the German bases in Spain and the secret Soviet note to France at the time of the abortive Summit meeting last spring. We should however be alive to the fact that we have not been entirely consistent with our proclaimed aims in respect of political consultations. For example, we are traditionally very reluctant to reveal to the Council even the broad general lines of our consultations with the U.S.A. in the field of defence; and in our capacity as a member of the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee we occasionally revealed a lack of interest in putting problems into NATO before an agreed position had been worked out between the Five.

POLITICAL CONSULTATION — PROBLEMS ARISING OUTSIDE THE TREATY AREA

Canadian Position

1. We agree that political consultation should be free from geographical limitations and we believe that it is quite in order for countries to raise for discussion in the Council or in the Political Advisers Committee problems arising anywhere in the world.

2. We consider that the ad hoc expert committees on the Middle East, the Far East and Africa perform a useful function in analysis developments in these areas and in exchanging information which a number of NATO members might otherwise be unable to obtain. We do not however agree that it would be either advisable or necessary to formalize such consultative machinery by setting up, as M. Spaak has suggested, permanent committees of experts on Africa and the Middle East.

3. We are not prepared to accept the Spaak thesis that the object of such consultation on problems outside the Treaty area should be to reach a common NATO position. Rather, the main purpose should be to exchange views and information so that each country in the formation of its national policies will be aware of the pre-occupations and attitudes of its partners. In the Canadian view the same philosophy should also apply to consultations in NATO on subjects up for discussion in the U.N.

4. There is a continuing need for a flexible and pragmatic approach to consultations in respect of the wide variety of problems, which are not per se directly related to NATO or the common interests of its members. For example, there should be a general understanding that while discussion in NATO will no doubt on occasion be mutually beneficial, NATO may not be the most effective or appropriate forum to attempt to work out an approach to such questions as the recognition of Red China, the problem of Cuba, or the problem of Netherlands New Guinea.

5, We strongly oppose the creation of formal links with other regional defence organizations but we are prepared to accept increased, informal, mutually beneficial exchanges of information and occasional visits by the respective secretariats provided no publicity is given to such exchanges.

6. It is important that NATO should not give the impression that it is the main spokesman for the free world or that the Alliance possesses a monopoly of wisdom and experience in respect of the critical international problems of today. NATO members would do well to accept the fact that often one of the best ways to resolve such problems is to take them out of the "cold war" context (the recent Congo situation is a good example) and that to involve NATO directly or even indirectly may be the best way to exacerbate the situation.

Comment

There is general agreement in NATO that there should be no extension of military commitments (which might for example be implied by the establishment of formal links with CENTO and SEATO) but there is a division of opinion as to what should be the objective of consultation in respect of problems arising in other areas and in respect of NATO's relationship with the regional pacts. One group composed mainly of the United States, the U.K., Germany, Turkey and Belgium appear to favour harmonization of national policies with respect to such problems and closer but not necessarily formal relationships with the regional organizations. The other group composed mainly of Norway, Denmark and Canada are in favour of such consultation on the grounds that the exchange of views are mutually beneficial per se and consider that their main objective should be to enable each member to be aware of the other members' attitudes and preoccupations; this group does not favour too close cooperation with the other regional organizations on the grounds that such cooperation would imply, at least in the mind of the public, links with the policies of those organizations.

DISARMAMENT

Canadian Position

1. In its work and in its public posture NATO should take greater account of the growing demand in the countries of the world for a balanced and controlled system of disarmament.

2. NATO should do more to stress its defensive aspects by:

(i) obtaining agreement on the part of the governments concerned to prevent bellicose statements by national or NATO military leaders, and

(ii) making it clearer to the peoples of the world that the basic aims of the West's defence and disarmament policies are the same i.e. the attainment of security and peace.

3. It should be made clear however that until some progress has been reached on controlled balanced disarmament, NATO has no alternative but to maintain adequate defensive strength to prevent military aggression or the threat of military aggression by the Soviet bloc.

4. The resources of NATO could be put to better use both in respect of intensifying the process of consultation on disarmament and in respect of obtaining military advice from the NATO military authorities on the implications of various disarmament proposals. In particular, we believe that it is impossible to separate disarmament planning from Western strategic planning and that it is therefore essential that NATO should continually review the Western positions on disarmament and NATO strategy and planning in relation to one another.

Comment

The progress made on consultation in NATO on disarmament in the past year has been disappointing, and there has been little evidence of enthusiasm for our earlier suggestion that better use might be made of NATO resources in analyzing the various proposals for disarmament, especially those put forward by the Soviet Union. Dissatisfaction about the degree of consultation does however appear to be fairly widespread; it would therefore seem to be appropriate to consider within the context of NATO Long Term Planning ways of improving NATO consultation on disarmament. In respect of our earlier suggestion for making better use of NATO's resources one of the difficulties has been to determine which NATO military body should deal with disarmament questions. The Department of National Defence is considering the idea of recommending the establishment of a strategic planning staff on the military side of NATO which inter alia would have the task of examining from a NATO military point of view proposals on disarmament as they arise.

SECTION II

DEFENCE PROBLEMS

The three main problems facing the Alliance in the defence field are (1) the absence of any agreement on a fully integrated air defence system for NATO Europe, (2) lack of progress in achieving a greater degree of standardization of equipment and a more effective use of the production resources of the member countries, (3) differences over atomic policy, and especially the refusal of the French Government to permit nuclear weapons on French territory unless they are under exclusive French control.

INTEGRATION OF DEFENCE FORCES

Canadian Position

1. We have consistently supported the principle of integration of NATO's defence forces and have frequently referred to the progress which has been made in the air defence field in North America as positive evidence of what can be accomplished.

2. Canada should continue to support implementation of this principle for the following reasons:

(i) an integrated NATO defence structure is the only effective and rational way of coordinating and organizing the activities and plans for a variety of national forces particularly in the nuclear age when a rapid and coordinated response to an aggression would be essential to survival;

(ii) with the increasing complexity of modern warfare a greater rather than a lesser degree of integration may be required;

(iii) even if it were considered advisable to organize individual self-sufficient national defence forces, the high cost of modern military equipment would make such an objective unattainable for most NATO countries.

Comment

An additional reason which cannot be expressed in the Council is that integration provides an important measure of assurance against any future independent German action. It is worth noting in this connection that the Germans have been in the forefront of those countries pressing for a greater degree of integration. Although a small measure of progress was made recently in respect of the integration of air defence in Europe it is clear that the French Government continues to insist on the concept of cooperation as opposed to integration and on the maintenance of French control over its units assigned to NATO.

It is also worth noting that this concept of military integration in NATO has no direct counterpart in the political field. However, there is a general understanding that the main objective of political cooperation is to reach a common position on problems of common concern to all members of the Alliance and in that sense it can be argued that members are prepared to forego certain national considerations in the interests of NATO solidarity. It should also be recognized that, although the political and military structures of the Alliance differ in the sense that the latter has supranational aspects whereas the former has not, there are a number of agreed directives to the military authorities approved by the member countries which limit the degree of authority given the Supreme Allied Commanders. Furthermore, it is open to any country to ask for a re-examination of these directives at any time. Finally, it should be borne in mind that the degree of integration implemented in NATO to date has not destroyed the national identify of the national contributions, and countries such as France have in fact obtained the approval from other members to withdraw temporarily from NATO, for operations elsewhere, forces which technically are still assigned to SACEUR.

STANDARDIZATION AND PRODUCTION QUESTIONS

Canadian Position

1. Canada has consistently pressed for a greater degree of standardization of NATO military equipment and should continue to take an active part in promoting efforts in this direction.

2. Similarly we should continue to promote efforts to achieve a greater degree of cooperation in the development and production of military equipment.

3. We should stress the need for a pragmatic approach to many of these problems especially since there is often a tendency on the part of many countries to regard multi-national production programmes as an end in themselves without regard to the question of whether such an arrangement is the speediest and least costly way of producing the particular piece of equipment.

4. We should emphasize that Canadian production facilities have not, so far, been effectively utilized by NATO, and that even in the case of joint production schemes carried out mainly in Europe Canada could supply certain self-contained components which could be incorporated in the end item.

Comment

There is often a tendency for European members to regard these projects as essentially European schemes which inter alia are designed to benefit the economics of the European countries producing the items. There is a need also to educate Europeans out of the habit of thinking of Canada solely as a donor country in respect of military equipment, a habit which not unnaturally arose out of our earlier role of supplying mutual aid in substantial quantities to the European members of NATO.

ATOMIC POLICY

Canadian Position

The 1954 and 1956 NATO Ministerial Meetings and the 1957 NATO Heads of Government Meeting resulted in agreement to (a) adopt a defence strategy based on a capacity to employ nuclear weapons in the event of overt Soviet military aggression (b) stockpile nuclear weapons in Europe; and (c) place intermediate range ballistic missiles at SACEUR's disposal.

In line with the agreement reached at these Ministerial Meetings decisions were made by the Canadian Government in respect of equipment for Canadian NATO forces which are based on support for the concept of giving a nuclear capability to the NATO shield forces. Also, in 1959, the government accepted SACEUR's recommendation that the eight F-86 squadrons of the Air Division should be re-equipped and that their role should be changed to that of strike/reconnaissance.[76] In order to be able to carry out this role, the aircraft selected, the CF-104, has a special configuration which enables it to carry nuclear weapons. The government has also announced its intention to acquire Honest John rockets for use in support of the Canadian Infantry Brigade in Europe.[77] Procurement of these two delivery systems is well advanced.

Although Cabinet approved in October 1958 the initiation of negotiations between Canada and the United States for the acquisition and storage of nuclear weapons for the use of Canadian forces[78] these were not carried beyond the stage of informal discussions at the military level and no decision has yet been reached to proceed further. If it were decided to negotiate such an agreement, a further question which would follow is the measure of control which the Canadian Government would wish to exercise over the use of such weapons.

Comment

The refusal of the French Government to accept nuclear weapons on its territory unless they are under exclusive French Control, and its determination to press ahead with the development of an independent French nuclear deterrent, have complicated the problem of obtaining an agreed NATO policy on nuclear weapons. One of the important practical effects of the French position has been to make it necessary for SACEUR to move to other NATO countries, and especially to Western Germany, some forces formerly stationed in France, including aircraft, which might be required to use nuclear weapons in the event of an emergency.

Under existing arrangements for tactical weapons, the means of delivery (carriers such as missiles, long range artillery, etc.) are normally supplied by the United States to the national forces under SACEUR's command but the warheads must remain in United States custody until their release is authorized by the President in the event of an emergency. To cover the arrangements setting up storage facilities for the warheads, the United States has proceeded to negotiate a series of bilateral agreements with the countries where the stockpiles are located (so far agreements have been concluded with Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Greece and Turkey). In the case of strategic weapons such as IRBM's, bilateral agreements of the countries where these weapons are stationed (so far only the U.K., Turkey, and Italy) which provide for a positive decision by both governments before the weapons can be fired. The arrangements for warheads are virtually the same as in the case of tactical weapons.

In effect, the NATO arrangements to date give the U.S.A. the main and determining decision as to when the weapons should be used. At the same time it is generally accepted that, if there is time, SACEUR has a responsibility to consult all the NATO governments through their representatives on the Council regarding the use of nuclear weapons.

Much thought has been given, both by officials and by journalists, to the possibility of "NATO control" over the use of nuclear weapons, assuming of course that the United States would be prepared to amend its legislation to permit this. The main difficulty of control by the NATO Council is that it would in effect impose fifteen vetoes over any proposal to use the weapons, and, to take an extreme case, would enable Iceland, which contributes no forces to the NATO military effort, to block a decision of the majority in favour of using nuclear weapons. In addition, the time required to consult fifteen governments could involve serious and possibly unacceptable risks from a military point of view. On the other hand, to leave the final decision almost exclusively in the hands of the Supreme Allied Commander would be equally objectionable; it would mean that the political leaders of the NATO countries would have relinquished to the NATO military Supreme Commander the awesome decision which might have the effect of expanding any limited aggression in Europe into a full scale nuclear war. So far no reasonable solution has been suggested from any source.

It will be recalled that last year the United States proposed the introduction of Polaris Medium Range Ballistic missiles into the forces under SACEUR under the same formula which had been followed in the case of IRBM's for Turkey and Italy. Because of French opposition this proposal made no headway. It now seems clear that new U.S.A. proposals will be considered at the December Ministerial meeting. According to the preview given our Ambassador in Washington by Mr. Merchant they have three principal aspects:

(1) An undertaking (by the United States) to maintain NATO nuclear weapons stockpiles at the level of NATO military requirements for the period of life of the North Atlantic Treaty.

(2) The United States would commit to NATO five Polaris submarines by the end of 1963 which would be assigned in the same way as the Sixth Fleet and which would operate (within NATO) under U.S.A. control.

(3) A proposal that NATO should establish a multilateral MRBM force operating as a NATO force on the basis of joint control by the North Atlantic Treaty members. If there should be agreement to establish such a force this would be done by proposing that the other NATO partners of the United States acquire and contribute one hundred Polaris missiles and launching platforms to operate under the joint authority of NATO. (The U.S.A. would prefer sea borne deployment but other possibilities could also be considered).

In the event such a force under (3) were established the United States would then be prepared to turn over the five Polaris submarines and their 80 missiles referred to under (2). It is contemplated that the NATO force would be internationally (i.e. NATO) staffed and the control of the use of these weapons would be the subject of collective arrangements worked out by the NATO allies. The U.S. also hopes that existing bilateral arrangements under which Thor and Jupiter (IRBM) missiles are stationed in the United Kingdom, Italy and Turkey would eventually be assimilated to the integrated NATO nuclear force contemplated.

All the indications are that the United States does not believe that any decision should be taken on the proposals at the Ministerial Meeting. The first two parts involve a unilateral action on the part of the United States and Ministers in the Council will be merely asked to note and, it is hoped, welcome these proposals. The third part, i.e. establishment of a multilateral NATO MRBM force involving the complex control problem, is regarded by the U.S. as an idea being launched for discussion.

Although governments are not being asked to commit themselves on the U.S.A. proposals, there undoubtedly will be considerable discussion of them at the NATO Ministerial Meeting and reference will undoubtedly be made to them in the communiqué.

Among the many important considerations which should be carefully weighed in determining the Canadian attitude in respect of the U.S.A. proposals, probably the most immediate ones are (a) our own intentions regarding the acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces, and (b) whether it would be wise to attempt to move too far too fast on a plan of such far-reaching implications until a serious attempt has been made by the new U.S.A. administration and its allies to explore with the Soviet Union the possibility of some accommodation on disarmament and other outstanding East-West issues such as Berlin.

While it would be imprudent for the West to call a halt to all plans and discussions regarding NATO defence and atomic policy pending evidence of progress on disarmament there would seem to be an imperative need for NATO members to make it clear in their communiqué that they have not abandoned their sincere desire to settle outstanding differences by negotiation and especially to come to an accommodation with the Soviet Union on disarmament.

SECTION III

ECONOMIC QUESTIONS

Canadian Position

1. The aim of all members of NATO should be to develop, in their dealings with one another and with countries outside the area, sound economic and trading policies which are in keeping with the character and proclaimed aims of the governments of the Alliance. They should recognize that sound economic policies and enlightened assistance to underdeveloped areas are worthwhile objectives in themselves particularly insofar as they will have the effect of expanding the world wide exchange of both goods and capital on a non-discriminatory basis and encourage the development of similar practices by other like minded countries.

2. NATO has a continuing role to play as a forum for intimate and confidential consultations in the economic field but not as an agency for Western action.

3. Generally speaking NATO's main role should be to keep a close watch over developments, domestic and external, in communist economic policies, pointing up danger areas which deserve special attention. Since we can expect that communist trade and aid efforts, particularly in underdeveloped countries, will be substantially expanded, the communist economic challenge to the West is bound to become increasingly serious and widespread.

4. The Communist economic challenge must be met by pursuing effective policies in the international specialized bodies concerned with economic questions and in bilateral relations with other countries, but, at the same time this challenge must be kept under close examination in NATO.

5. Finally, we should continue to regard NATO as a forum to which members can bring economic problems which they deem important and which in their view are not receiving the attention they deserve in other bodies.

Comment

Although a good deal of emphasis was attached earlier to the degree of economic cooperation implied in Article II of the Treaty the limitations inherent in NATO for cooperation in the economic field are now generally accepted. It should however be kept in mind that it was never intended that NATO should be an instrument for the implementation of economic policies. The Committee of Three's report, for example, pointed out in 1956 that the member countries should do what they can to keep each other informed of their national programmes and policies in the economic field. It made it clear, however, that NATO should not be regarded as an appropriate agency for administering such programmes or even for concerting the relevant policies of member nations. The Committee felt that there were other agencies and organizations better suited to these tasks.

In this connection it is also important to appreciate that the proposal to establish an OECD, of which Canada and the United States will be full members, represents an important step towards translating the principles of economic cooperation embodied in Article 2 into more concrete practical forms of action. If the aims of OECD are realized it should play a major role in improving the effectiveness of Western economic policies generally, and by way of consequence have the effect of containing the communist economic "offensive."

Most of the European members of NATO are experiencing today a high degree of economic growth which is likely to continue in the Sixties. In the circumstances it is reasonable to expect them to take a greater part in aid to countries outside the NATO area and to look after the economic interests of any of the less prosperous countries of Europe such as Turkey and Greece.

SECTION IV

INFORMATION ACTIVITIES

Canadian Position

1. The information programme of the Alliance should consist of a mixture of national and international activities.

2. There is a need for better coordination of the political and information work of NATO and for closer cooperation between the respective committees and branches of the International Staff.

3. The terms of reference of the Information Committee should be reviewed in consultation with the Political Advisers Committee.

4. The Information Committee in consultation with the Political Advisers Committee should seek to develop more effective methods of improving understanding of NATO outside the NATO area.

Comment

In the Canadian view one of the essential requirements for a successful NATO information programme is an agreed political basis, which to date has been somewhat lacking. Governments so far have not attempted to reach any agreement with regard to the image of NATO to be projected outside the area or to come to some agreed understanding with respect to NATO's present and future political role for presentation within the area. In the circumstances NATO information activities to date have concentrated on a factual recording of NATO's actual accomplishments.

In large measure the need for agreement on basic objectives is one of the purposes of NATO Long Term Planning. If some agreement can be achieved on the political side it should be possible for the Information Committee to function more effectively than it has in the past.

We should also recognize that probably more could be done by the Canadian Government Departments concerned in making better use of NATO information material and in keeping in closer contact with non-official institutions in Canada interested in NATO and in publicizing its activities. As far as External Affairs is concerned this would involve some increase in staff available for this purpose as well as additional funds to cover the costs involved.

SECTION V

SCIENCE ACTIVITIES

Canadian Position

1. The primary responsibility of the Science Committee is to promote the general scientific well-being of the Alliance as a whole.

2. There is an urgent need to review the scope and the modes of operation of the Science Committee.

3. The NATO Science Committee could make a real contribution in the field of defence research provided a clearer distinction is made between the defence and pure science activities of the Committee.

4. The Committee should be considered as an inter-government committee whose members are appointed and speak for their governments rather than as a committee composed of eminent scientists who do not necessarily reflect the views of their governments.

5. In order to ensure continuity between the meetings of the Committee there should be established in Paris a Committee of Alternates whose members would be the scientific advisers or attachés of the Permanent NATO Delegations.

Comment

Experience with the Committee during its two years of operation gives little encouragement to think that it will make a substantial contribution to the general scientific resources of the Alliance if it continues in its present form. It has established a Science Fellowship Programme, an Advanced Study Institute Programme and, more recently but limited purpose. It has also promoted interest in various scientific topics, such as oceanography, meteorology, defence psychology, operational research, etc. However, this piecemeal approach is not adequate to develop a broad and comprehensive programme for raising the general scientific well-being of the community. The Committee needs to devise a sound philosophy of scientific development in the light of which specific measures could be worked out to help solve special problems. This is a difficult task which is not amenable to the methods of a scientific advisory group, such as the Science Committee has become.

There have been indications from the results of the ad hoc meetings of the defence research directors that there is a real contribution to be made by NATO in the field of defence research. To date, the Science Committee itself has accomplished little in this field although it has spent much of its time in discussion of defence research problems. As currently constituted, the Committee is obviously not a proper body for decisions on defence research since few of the members of the Committee have any intimate knowledge of this field. It does seem, none the less, that Defence Research is the most promising field of scientific activity for NATO and clearly one of the first steps to be taken is to provide some regular mechanism for consideration of defence research problems at the level of the national directors.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — CANADIAN PROPOSAL FOR A NATO HEADS OF GOVERNMENT MEETING

In the light of the information contained in our telegram under reference I would be grateful if you could communicate as a matter of urgency the following message from the Prime Minister to President Eisenhower.

Text Begins.

From our conversations in June in Washington[79] and in New York in September[80] you will be aware of my view that the NATO governments should not delay the holding of a meeting at Heads of Government level any longer than is absolutely necessary. Recent international developments have reinforced my conviction in this regard. I have in mind particularly, the problems arising under long range planning in the Alliance, and especially those relating to nuclear policy. These and other problems will have to be examined carefully in the context of East-West relations and significant developments in the Sino-Soviet bloc. It seems to me that unless a concerted effort at the highest level is made to confront these issues, planning which is now being done will lack essential focus and direction.

The Honourable Mr. Green will be making a suggestion along these lines at the Ministerial Meeting of NATO this week. He will not make a formal proposal since I quite understand that it will not be possible for you, in the present transitional state, to commit your succession. And it is not the intention to upset the arrangements under way for the spring Ministerial Meeting. It is, however, my hope that, at the meeting which is about to open, agreement can be reached upon the importance of holding a Heads of Government meeting as early as possible in 1961. I would hope that by March a date could be finalized. Text Ends.

SECRET Ottawa, January 3, 1961

Dear Ralph [Weston],

As you know, Canada, along with the other members of NATO, agreed at the December Ministerial Meeting to study the suggested United States concept for a multilateral MRBM force for NATO. This is to be considered as a part of the current NATO long term planning studies and, presumably, efforts will be made to come to some decision at the Ministerial Meeting next May in Oslo.

It has occurred to me that the best place for a Canadian study to start would be in the sub-panel of the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions. Attached is a paper I have prepared in which I have attempted to focus attention on the questions which, it seems to me, we shall have to try to answer. I do not claim that the list of questions is complete or that they are necessarily couched in the best terms but at least the paper should serve as a starting point for our study.

In accordance with our conversation the other day I would suggest that the sub-panel might meet in two or three weeks to discuss this paper and to start the preparation of a draft Canadian "position paper" which might in due course be submitted to the Panel and ultimately to Ministers. I am sending copies of this letter and the enclosure to the other members of the Panel for their information.

Yours sincerely,

POINTS FOR CONSIDERATION IN STUDYING SUGGESTED
U.S.A. CONCEPT FOR A MULTILATERAL MRBM FORCE FOR NATO

Basic Proposition

1. As defined by Mr. Herter, "the defensive task (in the decade which lies ahead) calls for an effective NATO defence in an era of mounting nuclear and missile capabilities on both sides of the iron curtain." The United States Government considers that in order to provide an effective NATO defence MRBMs with nuclear warheads are required. This view is shared by the NATO military authorities and is supported by the decision at the 1957 NATO Heads of Government meeting that "intermediate range ballistic missiles will have to be put at the disposal of SACEUR."

2. The United States believes that, in spite of the inherent difficulties which will have to be overcome, "the multilateral concept offers the best means of providing a collective basis for the common defence in the MRBM field. Its fulfillment would have immense political significance for the cohesion of the Alliance." The U.S. Government believes "that this concept offers a rational approach to the problem of the MRBM power of the Alliance and, if successfully fulfilled, might offer a precedent for further moves in this field."

3. On the other hand, it is the opinion of the U.S. Government that "the creation of additional national nuclear weapons capabilities would have a marked divisive effect on the Alliance. It would mean duplication of effort and diversion of resources and tend to stimulate competition within the Alliance in the nuclear weapons field." Unquestionably this observation is directed towards the present policy of France and the expectation that, unless an alternative avenue is opened up, Germany, in due course, will inevitably follow suit.

Basic Questions for Consideration by Canada

4. In attempting to develop a Canadian position on the United States concept, there would seem to be certain basic questions to which we must address ourselves:

(1) Does Canada admit the validity of the military requirement for MRBMs in NATO?

(2) Even if we acknowledge the military requirement, do we consider that the political liabilities attached to a decision to go ahead with a programme for the acquisition of MRBMs (recognizing that they will not actually be available for three or four years) outweigh the military need for the weapons?

(3) Even if we think it unwise for NATO to acquire the weapons, would we be wise to oppose such action, recognizing the probability that if NATO does not act certain European countries, particularly West Germany, may take steps to acquire the weapons independently?

(4) If it is likely that, irrespective of our views, MRBMs will be deployed in Europe, do we consider that it would be in our interest to seek to have these weapons obtained and controlled under NATO auspices rather than:

(a) under bilateral arrangements between individual governments and the U.S.A., or

(b) at the independent disposal of national governments (as would be the case if the French policy were extended)?

(5) If the answer to the preceding question is affirmative, then what price should we be prepared to pay in order to achieve our purpose:

(a) in the area of political control;

(b) financially;

(c) militarily?

5. Before we can really tackle these basic questions a good deal more information about the United States concept and its implications will be required — some of which may not be immediately obtainable. Some of the points on which information is needed are dealt with in the following sections of this memorandum.

Requirement

6. Mr. Herter spoke of 80 missiles in 5 nuclear submarines (provided by the U.S.A.) plus 100 missiles to be provided by the other members of NATO as meeting the requirement through 1964, with the requirement thereafter to be determined subsequently.

Questions

(1) Is the ultimate requirement for MRBMs likely to be the 300 that SACEUR set some time ago, or some higher figure?

(2) If, as SACEUR has stated, these missiles can be considered as replacements for strike aircraft on a one-for-one basis, what would be the effect on current aircraft procurement and re-equipment programmes of a decision to establish a 180-missile force by 1964 (100 provided by multilateral financing and 80 in U.S. submarines)?

(3) What is the relationship, if any, between SACEUR's MRBM requirement and the IRBMs in the United Kingdom, Turkey and Italy?

Costs

7. Mr. Herter proposed that the MRBM force should be deployed at sea. In a document issued in May, 1960, by the United States Delegation to NATO, it was estimated that a force of our merchant vessels, each carrying 24 missiles (for a total of 96 missiles), would cost about $350 million excluding hulls. If it were desired to reduce the number of missiles per ship, the cost would be greater, since additional hulls, crews and control equipment would be required. The cost of deployment on barges for use on inland waterways, or on road vehicles was estimated to be somewhat smaller but still substantial — $250 million or more for a 100-missile force.

Questions

(1) Taking into account the fact that the U.S.A. would not be contributing, what would be the impact of a programme of the order or magnitude indicated above on the existing defence programmes of NATO members, assuming that the costs were spread over say a 5-year period with the heaviest expenditures coming in 1963?

(2) To what extent would further shortfalls in reaching MC 70 (or its successor plan) goals be acceptable to the military authorities in the interest of getting an MRBM force?

(3) Assuming that by reason of cost a 100-missile force is unattainable, is there a lower limit to the size of force which would be militarily useful or desirable?

Manning

8. Mr. Herter described the proposed force as "multilateral," but obviously there are practical limits to the application of this principle so far as the units responsible for firing the weapons are concerned. (This assumes, of course, that an internationally recruited "NATO Force" is out of the question.)

Questions

(1) To what extent would be militarily feasible or desirable to break up into national sub-units a 100-missile force deployed at sea, on inland waterways, on land, or by some combination of the three?

(2) What would the command implications be in respect of a composite force of the size envisaged?

Control

9. Mr. Herter's statement at the December Ministerial Meeting of the NATO Council makes it clear that, while the United States might ultimately be prepared to study other possibilities, a basic element of the concept of a multilateral MRBM force is that the U.S.A. would retain custody of the nuclear warheads. Thus multilateral control would be exercised only after the United States released the warheads and, ipso facto, had decided that so far as it was concerned the time had come to use them. This means that, as in the case of the current bilateral arrangements, the mechanism would involve three stages:

(1) The declaration of an emergency or state of alert;

(2) Release of the warheads from U.S. custody;

(3) A decision to use the weapons.

As to (1), if time or circumstances allowed, there would presumably be consultations leading to a joint decision, either in the NATO Council or by direct contact between governments. The decision regarding (2) clearly rests with the United States Government. As to (3), a requirement for a joint decision raises a possibility of 15 vetoes. In any event, the role of the NATO Governments other than the U.S.A. would be essentially negative — the imposition of a veto on the firing of the missiles.

10. Although the immediate effect of a multilateral arrangement would be to complicate the problem of reaching a decision to use MRBMs if this ever became necessary, and thus of detracting from the credibility of the deterrent, the United States believes that the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. The alternative would appear to be either for the missiles to be supplied on a bilateral basis, or for the U.S.A. to provide the whole of the MRBM force itself. Mr. Herter gave as his reason for preferring the multilateral concept that it would further the cohesiveness of the Alliance whereas the creation of additional national nuclear weapons capabilities would have divisive effect. No doubt he also had in mind that it would facilitate operational control by SACEUR and call for a smaller financial contribution on the part of the U.S.A.

11. Real as these advantages are, it must at the same time be acknowledged that the multilateral concept of control raises some fundamental problems of great complexity:

Questions

(1) Would a deterrent subject to 15 votes have any credibility?

(2) If there are not to be 15 vetoes, then what is to be the criterion for selecting the smaller group of powers in which control would be vested?

(3) What, if anything, could be done to meet the danger that such a smaller group, because of the responsibility entrusted to it, might tend to become an inner circle — an enlarged Standing Group?

(4) Is it realistic to suggest that some NATO members, perhaps including Canada, could be expected to subscribe towards the cost of such a force;

(a) if they did not supply a contingent to it; and/or

(b) if they were not members of the control body?

12. It is suggested that if the Departments concerned (National Defence, External Affairs and Finance) addressed themselves to the above questions it would assist in developing a Canadian position with respect to the U.S.A. proposals. Perhaps the sub-panel of the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions could be used for this purpose.

Rapport de la délégation à la réunion ministérielle de l'OTAN

Report by Delegation to NATO Ministerial Meeting

SECRET [Ottawa], January 6, 1961

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — PARIS — DECEMBER 16-18, 1960

Contrary to advance press speculation, the 1960 annual meeting of NATO Foreign Defence and Finance Ministers did not attempt to reach any firm conclusions on the main subjects under consideration. Because of the position of the United States Delegation representing the departing Eisenhower administration, the incomplete nature of the report on long-term planning and the complexity of many of the new suggestions relating to NATO nuclear policy, it was generally acknowledged by Ministers that no major decisions could be expected. It was therefore an inconclusive meeting but a thoroughly useful one characterized by lively discussion and frank exchanges on current and long-term problems relating to the international situation, political and economic cooperation and NATO's position and posture in the world today.

The Canadian Delegation played an active part in the discussions of the international situation and on long-term planning, where Mr. Green took the lead in stressing the importance of presenting a good public image of the Alliance and of NATO members accepting fully their responsibilities as members of the United Nations. A Canadian suggestion advocating the holding of a NATO Heads of Government meeting as early as possible in 1961 was put forward during the discussion of long-term planning. After Mr. Herter had explained that he could not commit the incoming United States administration it was agreed to consider the suggestion again in the Permanent Council in the light of developments in the new year.

The report submitted below summarizes the discussion on the main agenda items as follows:

I Review of the International Situation

II Long Term Planning

(i) Non-military aspects

(ii) Military aspects

III Defence Problems

IV Next Ministerial Meeting

I. INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

East-West Relations (Soviet Policy, Germany-Berlin, Disarmament).

Much of the discussion was directed to the experts' report on Soviet policy, which was generally commended. The report noted that Soviet policy, deflected from its former course by Western unity and strength and by fears of the consequences of nuclear war, is now aimed primarily at the extension of Soviet influence in the underdeveloped areas of the world. To achieve this the Soviet Union must avoid war with the West and avoid appearing to be responsible for the cold war. It must not however become too tolerant of the West because this confuses Communist parties and draws criticism from the Chinese. For these reasons Soviet short term policy fluctuates although its long term policy of struggle with the West (short of war) remains constant.

Mr. Herter expressed general agreement with experts' report and drew attention to the existing Soviet dilemma of how to avoid nuclear war and still maintain Communist progress in the struggle with the West. He drew the conclusion that following the Moscow conference the Communist world is now under dual leadership. On summitry he was cautious and he expressed uncertainty as to whether the Soviet Union would call for a "final meeting" on Berlin or resolve the problem by unilateral action. Desirable or not a Summit meeting probably could not be avoided. Another failure, however, would undoubtedly greatly increase international tension. In the United States view, a meeting of Heads of Government should be the culmination of negotiations by normal diplomatic procedures and not the initiation of talks. On disarmament he estimated that the Soviet Union is not now prepared to enter into serious discussions but is treating the subject as a propaganda vehicle.

Most of the other speakers subscribed to the analysis of Soviet policy in the experts' paper. Some of the more interesting remarks are worth recording briefly. Lord Home expressed the view that the Soviet Union would now step up their anti-western activities and that politically they would concentrate in the United Nations to achieve a decisive shift in the balance of power. On disarmament he was not sure that the U.S.S.R. are completely insincere since the "nuclear spread" frightens them; he stressed the problem which inspection poses for the Soviet Union as the world's "greatest secret society."

On Berlin Lord Home acknowledged tacitly the possibility of a new arrangement and he emphasized that on this as on other outstanding general problems the West would have no choice but to negotiate and to seek to arrive at a settlement with the Soviet Union. After describing recent developments concerning Berlin Mr. Brentano said that the most effective deterrent in the present situation was the U.S.S.R.'s conviction that unilateral action on Berlin would bring about a military reaction from NATO. The Soviet Union must therefore recommence discussions on Berlin for which the West should set two conditions: (1) adequate preparation (2) no meeting would be held under a Soviet threat. Both M. Couve de Murville and Mr. Luns cautioned against the dangers of allowing our problems with the Soviet Union to be treated one by one; any Summit meeting should therefore deal with the broad range of East-West problems and should not be confined to Berlin alone.

Mr. Green commended the experts' analysis and noted that on balance Mr. Khrushchev's policy of détente seems advantageous to the West. At the same time we should be prepared for departures from it caused by internal and bloc factors and should meet these oscillations by maintaining our policies as steadily as possible. Moreover, in preparing ourselves for likely overtures from the Soviet Union we must be certain among ourselves what our vital interests are, that Khrushchev understands our determination to defend them, and that we agree on what room we have for manoeuvre. (Text of Minister's statement at Annex "A").

Before dealing with Belgian policy in the Congo Mr. Wigny described "the desolate impression" which the debate had made on him. From what he had heard he concluded that the West was now definitely on the defensive; he urged unity in the fact of Soviet advances and an attempt to reach a common position in our long-term planning.

Other Problems

Mr. Herter reported on the present situation in Laos and in Cuba. On Laos he said the United States continues to seek a political solution with a government representing all nationalist and non-communist elements which would pursue a policy of neutralism favourable to the West. He stressed that external assistance in terms of men and material was being given to the Pathet Lao from the Soviet Union and not from China. On Cuba he described its political movement towards the Soviet orbit as being undisguised. Cuban forces now equipped by the Communist numbered some 200,000 and although inadequate for fighting against the United States they could be a very disruptive force in central and South America. He estimated that Castro's Government was rapidly losing popular support and that less than 50% of the Cubans were now with him.

Discussion of the Middle East was confined to a short review by the Turkish Foreign Minister of conditions in the main countries in the area. His general theme was that, in spite of the relative tranquility, the area continues to be one of the troublesome regions for world peace. In this situation Turkey believes that CENTO has played and will continue to play an important role.

On Africa Mr. Wigny expounded at some length on Belgian policy in the Congo. He gave as its three main elements: (1) political non-intervention (2) provision of technical assistance and (3) collaboration with the United Nations. The Portuguese Foreign Minister described Soviet arms deliveries to the "crypto-communist" government of Guinea. Mr. Luns gave the Dutch appreciation of the Malayan Prime Minister's efforts to mediate the problem of West New Guinea saying that for his government a bona fide trusteeship was not unacceptable but that it would have to end with genuine self-determination.

II. LONG-TERM PLANNING

Non-Military Aspects

Discussion based on the Secretary General's progress report was fairly wide-ranging and followed no systematic pattern. It did however produce some particularly useful exchanges on political consultation, NATO and the U.N. and NATO's role in respect of such questions. In respect of problems, such as Germany, Berlin, East-West relations, there was general agreement that the purpose of such consultation is to obtain as wide a measure of agreement as possible and preferably a common position. On other questions, however, especially those which might be described as "colonial" there was a wide divergence of views.

Towards the end of the debate on the international situation, following Mr. Wigny's intervention, the Secretary-General criticized the Council for allowing the discussion to limit itself to an analysis without passing to what he regarded as the essential stage of drawing conclusions. He insisted that the Council must recognize that Berlin and Germany aside, all the preoccupations of the West lay outside what could be regarded as the Treaty area. In the circumstances the absence of any reaction to the efforts of the Belgian and Portuguese Foreign Minister to make a reality of consultation on their problems created "a deplorable psychological effect." He concluded that unless the Alliance did more to practice its proclaimed solidarity NATO would be seriously weakened.

This pessimistic note and a plea for a concerted NATO position was echoed later by the Belgian and Portuguese Ministers who made it quite clear that in their opinions that not only was consultation in NATO inadequate but they were being let down by many of their NATO partners. Mr. Sarper also gave a degree of support to Spaak's thesis by expressing disappointment that his intervention on Middle East affairs had not aroused any interest or reaction in the Council.

The majority, however, clearly did not share this point of view and M. Spaak's immoderate criticism was not well received. Lord Home described Spaak's outburst as overly pessimistic and said that political statements in the Council did have an effect which we should not underestimate even if they did not give rise to an actual debate. Mr. Lange referred to the "very exaggerated criticism of our organization by the Secretary-General" and later in the discussion made it clear that while a unified command structure and a common position in respect of NATO military cooperation is essential the very nature of our societies and governments is such that anything approaching a unified command in the political field is not possible. He and most other Ministers agreed that members should continue to consult on the broad lines of policy in respect of most international problems of interest to members. In respect of issues directly related to NATO as a whole, the Council must be recognized as the proper forum for such discussions and the object should be to agree on a common line of approach.

In the case of problems not directly related to the Treaty area, or to the Alliance as a whole, the majority shared the Canadian view that the main purpose of such consultation should be to make members aware of individual attitudes and preoccupations well before national policies become fixed or action is taken. Obviously the aim of countries in bringing these questions before the Council is to obtain as wide a measure of agreement as possible, but inability to reach a collective viewpoint does not mean that such consultations have failed. Mr. Luns pointed out that it is difficult for member countries always to take sides in disputes in which one or more partners is involved. The important thing was for members to bring their problems to NATO for consultation at an early stage. If consultation shows that a number of countries disagree with the proposed policy and the country decides to go ahead it cannot expect complete solidarity nor can it claim at a crucial moment that it has been abandoned by its partners.

NATO and the U.N.

On the relationship between NATO and the U.N. and NATO consultation on U.N. subjects, Canada took the lead in stressing the importance of presenting a good image of the Alliance, especially in the eyes of newly independent United Nations members. Mr. Green urged other members to take their United Nations responsibilities seriously, to be less apologetic about those questions on which NATO has been subject to attack in the United Nations, and to make more widely known the unique contribution which NATO has made to world peace and stability in the post-war years. On consultation in NATO he pointed to the difficulties in the way of attempting to have detailed and topical discussions on the rapidly shifting events at the U.N. In the Canadian view a pragmatic approach to NATO consultation on U.N. subjects was best but we should acknowledge that any attempt to act as a bloc in the U.N. would only isolate us and perhaps diminish the influence which we could otherwise exert as individuals. It is democracy's dedication to individuality, after all, which distinguishes the NATO countries from the only real bloc in the world, the communist bloc (text of Mr. Green's statement attached at Annex "B").[81]

The lively discussion which followed revealed considerable support for the Canadian point of view. In particular Mr. Lange agreed on the importance of winning the confidence of the new nations in the U.N. or elsewhere which would be apt to justify the accusations frequently levelled that NATO is an Alliance for the defence of colonial interests. He stressed the need for flexibility in consultation, the need to draw, where possible, a line between those subjects on which consultation must aim at joint action and other problems. Caution should also be exercised in spreading the geographical area too much lest we detract from the possibility of having a real thorough discussion on questions of essential common concern.

[81] Non reproduite; l'original ne donne que le début de la déclaration.
Not reproduced; only the beginning of the statement is given in the original.

Both Mr. Sarper and Mr. Luns indicated they felt NATO countries could fulfil their functions at the U.N. in a more satisfactory way but Mr. Luns found it difficult to share Mr. Green's optimism and confidence regarding the U.N. He thought it disquieting that many of the newly independent countries at the U.N. tended to develop an ill-conceived loyalty to blocs, an anti-western partiality and a reluctance to shoulder their responsibilities. Belgium, he felt, has some justification when expressing disappointment, misgivings and somewhat moderate enthusiasm at the way the U.N. has been handling Belgium's very grave problem in the Congo.

Lord Home said he was in wholehearted agreement with Mr. Green's view on the need to pay more attention to the U.N. What was needed was not a NATO bloc but a greater effort to achieve through consultation common western thinking on many of the issues arising in the U.N. especially those dealing with colonial territories. NATO in his view, might profitably attempt to work out a common line of thinking on how to deal with uncommitted countries and the problem of neutralism.

The Portuguese and Belgian Foreign Ministers strongly supported by M. Spaak again complained about the lack of response, let alone support, from their colleagues in NATO on their particular problems. M. Spaak pointed out that the Portuguese representative in the Permanent Council had put their case on the U.N. Afro-Asian resolution to the Council in lots of time, but got no reaction. He complained that the spirit of consultation was lacking and whole heartedly endorsed the Portuguese-Belgian contention that NATO has a very direct interest in respect of the problems lying outside its boundaries. Members' attitudes and interests obviously diverged but complete solidarity and unanimity on such questions was not being requested. It was not enough to let the questions put by Portugal and other countries in the Council go unanswered. NATO would, in his view, be seriously weakened if some of its members feel that they are being abandoned by their partners.

Economic Questions

Relatively little attention was given to economic matters by Ministers. The creation of the OECD was warmly welcomed by all, and by Canada, Norway and the United States as the main forum for implementing many of the principles of economic cooperation set out in Article II of the Treaty.

On NATO's economic role the consensus was that the Alliance was not and should not become an agency for executive action. National economic and assistance policies must be implemented through functional agencies specially designed for the task. Canada and most other members endorsed the view that NATO was particularly concerned with (i) economic problems directly related to the common defence effort, (ii) ensuring the sound economic growth of less-favoured members of the Alliance, (iii) consultations on Sino Soviet economic offensive. Finally, as a group comprising many of the more industrially developed countries. Ministers acknowledged their special responsibility for providing through competent economic organizations aid to the under-developed countries of the free world. Both Mr. Green and Lord Home drew attention to NATO's limitations in this field and to the need to avoid the impression of giving a NATO label to Western aid.

In regard to assistance to member countries the Turkish Foreign Minister led off with detailed exposition of the size of Turkey's defence burden and the inadequate relative rate of growth of the economy. In conclusion, he put forward, with Greek and Italian support, a draft resolution setting up a special working group to study ways and means of establishing a mechanism to provide for assistance to the less favoured members of the Alliance. The lack of additional support did not discourage Mr. Sarper, nor did Mr. Herter's pointed reference to a recent resolution of the Permanent Council on the same question. The Turkish delegation did, however, make a number of amendments to their resolution so that the final innocuous version passed without discussion at the closing session.

Psychological Action (This is a new term to describe counter propaganda activities in peacetime.)

Although a separate report had been prepared, few Ministers dealt directly with this question. Even the Germans who had been pressing in the Permanent Council for practical measures, Secretariat positions etc., confined themselves to a description of the problem with emphasis on the fact that while the NATO Secretariat should help to coordinate national activities final responsibility for any action would rest and should be taken by national governments. Mr. Luns addressed the problem in terms of the public presentation of Western proposals. His approach came close to the Canadian view that what is required is not new machinery but better coordination of national efforts and cooperation with existing NATO information services. There was no dissent from the view that the ultimate responsibility for the dissemination of information should continue to rest with individual governments. The prevailing lack of enthusiasm for NATO propaganda activity was well illustrated when, despite strong support from M. Spaak and the Greek Foreign Minister, M. Segni was unable to obtain backing for his proposal that NATO should issue a manifesto to counter the communiqué recently put out following the meeting of Communist parties in Moscow.

Disarmament

In addition to general reference to this question during the discussion of the international situation the German and Norwegian Ministers urged better political consultation in the Council on disarmament. M. Brentano suggested that a special meeting of disarmament experts be convened, on the lines of the Soviet experts group, to consider acceptable political bases for disarmament and especially an appreciation of Soviet intentions relating to disarmament. Such broad estimates would, in the German view, greatly facilitate the formulation of specific proposals by those directly involved in the negotiations. Mr. Lange recommended that long term planning should encompass arms control as one of the subjects originally suggested by Mr. Herter. For political and presentational reasons NATO members must continue to press for realistic negotiations on disarmament. At the same time there must be no contradiction between NATO attitudes and actions and disarmament policies which we defend at the U.N. and elsewhere.

Civil Emergency Planning

Only the Netherlands and German Ministers spoke on this problem. Both stressed the need for more attention to the subject and asked that careful consideration be given to their proposals put forward earlier in the Council. M. Brentano contended that civil emergency measures were no less important than ordinary defence measures, that member state should be prepared to accept and implement recommendations of the Council in this field.

LONG TERM PLANNING

Military Aspects

For all their importance and the advance publicity, the long-awaited U.S.A. nuclear proposals did not result in any substantive discussion. Moreover, Mr. Herter made it clear that, with one exception, the points put forward relating to NATO nuclear policy were not "proposals" but "suggestions" which together constituted a "concept." In addition to nuclear policy his statement covered problems concerning NATO conventional forces and U.S.A. balance of payments.

As a means of meeting SACEUR's medium-range ballistic missile requirement Mr. Herter offered for consideration the concept of a "truly multilateral (force) with multilateral ownership, financing and control ... and mixed manning to the extent considered operationally feasible by SACEUR."

The first part of his "concept" was a United States offer to commit to NATO before the end of 1963 "as an interim MRBM force" 5 Polaris submarines having a combined capability of firing eighty missiles. Second, in taking this step the United States "would expect that the other members of NATO would be prepared to contribute approximately 100 missiles to meet SACEUR's requirements" under the suggested multilateral concept. Mr. Herter made it clear that the United States contemplated selling the missiles and the necessary equipment and deployment vehicles to the other NATO members and that the United States favoured sea deployment. Third, although the warheads made available for the Polaris missiles would remain in U.S. custody, Mr. Herter indicated that consideration could also be given to increasing the authority of the Alliance over the atomic stockpile as a whole. Finally, in order to remove any doubt about the future availability of nuclear weapons Mr. Herter stated that "it is the firm policy of the United States to keep in the NATO area under U.S. custody, nuclear weapons contributed by the United States to the stockpile for the execution of approved NATO plans."

In support of the concept Mr. Herter implied that it was designed to prevent the creation of additional national nuclear capabilities and that by avoiding duplication of effort and diversion of resources it would be of immense significance for the political cohesion of the Alliance. He did not however discount the numerous legal, technical, financial and political problems to be resolved; U.S.A,. participation in multilateral force would of course require congressional action and he assumed that parliamentary action would be required in other countries.

On conventional forces Mr. Herter stressed the importance of maintaining them at an adequate level to permit a response appropriate to the nature of the attack. He referred to General Norstad's recent plea for a substantial conventional capability and to his statement that "the threshold at which nuclear weapons are introduced into the battle should be a high one." He stressed that the deployment of MRBM's should not mean skimping on the equally important task of building up other shield forces. The remainder of his statement dealt with the seriousness of the U.S.A. balance of payments situation which, in the light of U.S.A. worldwide defence commitments and the changed economic relationship between the U.S.A. and Europe, made it necessary to study carefully what should be the United States "proper portion of the load." He contended that a sound U.S.A. balance of payments position and a strong dollar are "essential to the free world." Prefacing his concluding plea to the United States allies to undertake a greater share of the common effort, Mr. Herter indicated that some redeployment of U.S. forces "may become a necessity unless our balance of payments can be brought into a more reasonable equilibrium."

For the most part the other Ministers confined their remarks to expressions of welcome and acknowledgement that the suggestions required detailed study before any decisions could be arrived at. Lord Home welcomed the offer to assign 5 Polaris submarines to NATO and the undertaking to maintain nuclear warheads available for NATO forces as long as NATO military planning requires them. He thought the suggestion of a MRBM force should be carefully examined as should all aspects of nuclear support including Mr. Herter's other idea of increasing NATO authority over the nuclear stockpile in Europe. He concluded by observing that the U.K. had a balance of payments situation as difficult as U.S.A. and that a strong pound was as essential as a strong dollar.

The French reaction was non-committal. M. Couve de Murville said that his delegation "greeted with satisfaction" the indications of U.S.A. willingness to assign Polaris submarines to SACEUR and to maintain stockpiles of nuclear weapons in the NATO area. With respect to the MRBM force he noted there were a number of essential problems to be considered.

Mr. Green expressed Canada's willingness to study the suggestions. In particular his statement was designed to stress the need to prevent misunderstanding by the public of those proposals ... as a result of over dramatization in their public presentation. As a consequence of Mr. Green's remarks Mr. Herter intervened again to emphasize that the U.S.A. was merely advancing suggestions and did not intend that decisions should be taken at this time. (Copy of Mr. Green's statement at Annex "C").

In the event the terms agreed on for the communiqué made it quite clear that the suggestions regarding the MRBM force constituted merely a concept which had been noted and referred for study in detail by the Permanent Representatives. (Copy of communiqué[82] at Annex "D").

III. DEFENCE PROBLEMS

Status of Military Effort

There were relatively few speakers and virtually no real discussion of the report on the 1960 Annual Review and the relevant Military Committee assessments. The general import of these reports was that the ability of major commanders to carry out their missions will remain in jeopardy unless further progress is made towards meeting the minimum NATO military requirements. Special attention was drawn to the absence of any progress in building up a mobile NATO MRBM force.

Mr. Gates, who led off, made an unusually mild exhortation for action to remedy the weaknesses underlined by the Military Committee. He then developed as his main theme, the argument that the other NATO members should make the greater contribution which is possible by virtue of their improved economic position. He referred to the cost and complexity of the United States mixed strategic deterrent forces and of the military aspects of their space programme, all of which would be of significant importance to NATO in the coming years. He emphasized that in the light of changing circumstances two main amendments to the U.S.A. military assistance programme were being made. First, the United States would not be able to continue to provide indefinitely military equipment on a grant basis to nations which now have the financial ability to purchase. In this spirit, the arrangements with France, Germany, Luxembourg and the Federal Republic of Germany have already been terminated. Second, some change would be required in respect of using the U.S.A. military assistance programme as means of support for coordinated research development and production of modern weapons in Europe. Where production lines are already established in the U.S.A. or elsewhere and where it is not worthwhile to establish additional ones, the European countries should consider the advantages of purchasing from existing production facilities. At the same time when decisions are made to initiate coordinated production in Europe of weapons developed in the U.S.A. Mr. Gates indicated his government would continue to provide the necessary technical assistance.

The German statement covered almost every aspect of the German defence effort as well as their views on important NATO problems. Throughout, Mr. Strauss stressed the importance of a greater degree of integration, rationalization and standardization. He reviewed in familiar terms German personnel and land procurement problems; he urged greater simplicity in infrastructure procedures in order to speed up construction of projects in Germany. On materiel, he spoke of long delays in obtaining delivery of modern weapons and the problem for Germany of choosing between several weapons or types of weapons for the same purpose. He highlighted the importance of the cooperative F104 production scheme and said that Germany had already committed itself to carry out procurement programmes for modern aircraft in the order of DM 2.3 billion, an amount larger than that in all the other cooperative European defence production programmes put together.

Mr. Strauss warned of the dangerous chain reaction which would result if consideration were given to a reployment of U.S.A. forces. Talk of "Fortress America" might lead to unjust fears among American allies and provoke dangerous speculation in Soviet minds. He then developed German views on Soviet and Chinese attitudes towards war, emphasizing that coexistence will continue for a long time but that Khrushchev would get rid of his hesitations about war as soon as the Soviet bloc acquired a sufficient superiority in the political, economic, military and technical fields to make the risk of war appear acceptable or at least calculable.

He indicated satisfaction that some steps had been taken in NATO on psychological action. For Germany the problem created by Soviet propaganda re German rearmament was particularly difficult. It has had its effect. Every so often in Bonn he had to explain to both the German and the foreign press why his government is trying to fulfil its defence obligations, and why it is trying to give its forces a nuclear capability. At the same time the German government is periodically required to explain to SACEUR why it has not fully reached the already reduced planning goals, and why there are serious shortcomings in the field of nuclear capabilities. The same things which are being criticized by the responsible NATO authorities are being exploited for propaganda purposes as the "great German military machine." He asked that a responsible and influential allied statesman tell the facts to the world at large.

On nuclear weapons he stressed the importance of reaching a decision in a few months on the U.S.A. proposals, a decision which should be taken preferably at a meeting at Heads of Government level. In considering the U.S.A. offer, however, serious thought must be given to the whole concept of nuclear requirements in Europe in the light of the completely new situation where the U.S.A. as the largest and most powerful ally is no longer invulnerable to Soviet attack. In the circumstances the real strength of NATO will depend more and more on its European members. In order to organize more effectively for the years ahead Mr. Strauss proposed (1) the establishment of a NATO operations research office which would use the most modern equipment to evaluate the effectiveness of NATO plans and programme; (2) the development of a practical plan for closer integration and more intense NATO-wide research, development and production activities; (3) reduction of security standards in order to achieve greater technological integration; (4) the establishment of a nuclear energy commission which would begin with a study of nuclear weapons requirements as they pertain to the defence of Europe.

The other speakers, Italy, Greece, and Turkey devoted most of their remarks to a short survey of their own particular defence problems with a good deal of stress laid by Greece and Turkey on their reliance on external aid.

Mr. Harkness spoke of individual national responsibilities in respect of meeting accepted goals and of the different degrees of progress revealed in the Annual Review. He stressed Canada's intention to discharge her responsibilities and recognized that we have accepted obligations to supply forces under NATO Command equipped with, and ready to use, the most up-to-date and effective weapons. In conclusion he emphasized the importance of standardization of equipment and procedures in achieving the most effective use of forces at disposal of NATO, (text of Minister's statement at Annex "E"). Following a relatively short discussion the draft resolution on defence was adopted without change, (text at Annex "F").†

Infrastructure

Although not on the agenda, there was a good deal of informal "behind the scenes" manoeuvring at the meeting on a revised cost-sharing arrangement in the light of U.S.A. insistence on a sizeable reduction (originally a reduction from 36.98% to 25%) in its share of the programme for 1961-64. The main reasons advanced by the United States for this reduction were the improved economic position of the European countries and the deteriorating U.S.A. balance of payments situation. The same considerations lay behind the Canadian claim for a proportionate reduction. While some of the European nations, and particularly Germany, were willing to absorb the U.S.A. reduction they were very reluctant to admit the validity of the Canadian position that our share of 6.15% should be reduced proportionately to the U.S.A. reduction.

After much informal discussion the International Staff obtained a wide measure of agreement on a compromise whereby the U.S.A. share would be reduced to 30%, the Canadian share to 5.15% and the Belgian share to 4.24% with these decreases being absorbed by increases in the contributions of seven European members with Germany having the major increase from 13.72% to 20%. While for a time it appeared that all countries could accept this compromise, the Turkish and Greek Foreign Ministers indicated on the last day of the meeting they could not since it did not meet their insistence for a decrease in their contributions. The problem was consequently referred back to the Permanent Council. Ministers did however agree in principle that the future programme should amount to £250 million.

Cooperation in Research, Development and Production

The Armament Committee's report on this subject was generally commended and adopted following a short discussion. Mr. Watkinson, referred to U.K. efforts to share the burden of new weapons and armaments and said that the real difficulty will lie in trying to translate basic military requirements into cooperative projects. He urged that the Committee concentrate on its current list of 16 projects dealing with short term requirements and existing developments and not be given additional ones which would overload the facilities. He said he hoped the U.S.A. offer on MRBM's would be examined within a broad reassessment of NATO's strategy and stressed that in respect of future tasks of the Armament Committee we must make the weapons fit the strategy and not vice versa.

IV. FUTURE MINISTERIAL MEETINGS

NATO Heads of Government Meeting

During the discussion on long-term planning Mr. Green put forward the suggestion that agreement be reached on the importance of convening a NATO Heads of Government meeting at the earliest possible date in 1961. Support was given by the Greek Foreign Minister and to a lesser extent by the German Delegation, which felt that final approval of the U.S.A. military proposals should be given at such a meeting. However, when Mr. Herter explained that he could not commit the incoming United States administration, it was agreed after some discussion to consider the suggestion again in the Permanent Council in the light of developments in the new year.

Spring Ministerial Meeting

Ministers accepted the invitation of the Norwegian Government to hold the annual spring meeting of Foreign Ministers in Oslo in May.

SECRET

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
DECEMBER 16, 1960

Mr. Chairman:

In the review of the international situation, I should like to say just a few words about the Soviet policy since May. Before doing that, I welcome the effective attention which has been given by the Political Advisers' Committee to the preparation of the paper which is the background of our discussion today. The report reflects the high level of experience of the experts chosen to participate in the discussion of this very complex and important subject and is, in my judgement, a real demonstration of the value which can be gained from political consultation. The paper demonstrates that changes in Soviet policy are not adopted solely for their effect on the West, but also have important internal causes in the Soviet Union. The degree of importance which we attach to such changes should therefore be correspondingly less. I think we all agree that the Communist bloc is hostile to the West and will continue to be so in the foreseeable future. We are also probably agreed that the advantages to us of Khrushchev's policy of détente outweigh the disadvantages. I think, therefore, that we should hope that Khrushchev will sooner or later take up this policy again in his relations with the West. At the same time, we should be prepared for departures from it, caused by internal and bloc factors. In the face of these oscillations, we should try to maintain our policies as steadily as possible and not consider the present tough Soviet attitude to be a special cause for alarm. By his past performance, Mr. Khrushchev appears to be sufficiently flexible so that he can retreat from a situation which develops too dangerously. Therefore, if our own position is consistent and well known to the Communists, we are actually diminishing the danger of war by sticking to it and not retreating or attempting to modify it hastily in the face of Soviet threats and pressure.

However, the recent Communist summit meeting, and the statement which it issued, compels us to look further than this. Two things have struck me about the communiqué issued in Moscow at the conclusion of the meeting of the Communist parties. First, that the Russians and the Chinese were able to agree on a detailed statement covering all the major areas in dispute between them; second, that they have produced a document which, on the most essential issues, commits neither side to a retreat from its present policies. It is true that the statement accepts the Soviet position on many questions, but it does so in such a way that the Chinese could continue to pursue their present course and still find justification for it in the statement.

We have no way of telling how effective the meetings and statements have been in bringing about greater accord between the Soviet and China, except to watch the behaviour of the two sides in the months ahead. It does seem to me unlikely that either side will renounce its position completely or that they will be able to find a middle road acceptable to both. On the other hand, having signed the statement they are now less likely to quarrel about their differences in public. I think it will be important for Western policy to take account of this situation. Firmness and steadiness will be the first essential, so that the Chinese are discouraged from viewing us as a paper tiger, and from urging this view on the Russians. On the other hand, we should not permit firmness to turn into rigidity. Otherwise it will be hard for Khrushchev to argue with the Chinese that negotiation and compromise are possible and desirable.

In terms of our appreciation of Soviet policy itself, and of the consequences of the Sino-Soviet dispute, as revealed by the Moscow Conference, total war is, by reason of our retaliatory strength, no longer regarded by the Soviet Union as an instrument of policy. We should, therefore, prepare ourselves for the possible overture the Soviet Union will make to negotiate on the major problems which stand between us. We must be certain among ourselves what our vital interests are, in order to take advantage of the situation, and that Mr. Khrushchev understands our determination to defend them. And, moreover — and I think this is very important — moreover, we must also be agreed among ourselves what room we have for manoeuvre. We should be able thereby to avoid pursuing policies which are simply a response to Soviet Russia. Too often, Mr. Chairman, we get caught in that position, seeming to pursue policies which are merely a response to the Soviets.

As a defensive alliance, the military strength of NATO will be used only against aggression. I suggest that we should be able to demonstrate that the vitality of our political philosophy is such that flexibility is not a sign of frailty, and that the strength we command will be used in the interests of peace, and as an additional inducement to negotiations.

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
DECEMBER 16, 1960

Mr. Chairman:

At this stage I should like to say just a few words about the proposals made by Secretary Herter. I imagine that we are all agreed that these important, very important proposals which he has submitted will require careful study, not only by Ministers who happen to be here at this meeting but by member governments before they will be in a position to express opinions on the substance of the proposals. That is certainly the situation insofar as Canada is concerned. These studies will of course be directed not only to the military aspects of the proposals but to their political and economic implications as well. The question of control of nuclear weapons under the proposed arrangements would be among the many central problems on which important questions will have to be answered.

In the meantime, however, public expectation of important decisions to be made by this meeting has already been aroused by speculation in the press. More recent comment has no doubt helped to place this matter in more accurate perspective. Nevertheless, the impression that new decisions are about to be taken at this meeting doubtless still persists. I would hope for my part that the communiqué and any public statement will make it clear that all that has occurred at this meeting is that certain suggestions have been put forward for discussion and for further study.

Since these suggestions involve new concepts in NATO nuclear policy, I think we should avoid linking them in the communiqué to earlier decisions taken by the Ministerial Council. I also hope that the communiqué will convey the balanced account of the purposes of NATO which we have always sought to maintain in the past.

I have in mind, of course, that there should be an appropriate reference to our determination to promote a peaceful settlement of outstanding international issues, including disarmament, while maintaining the defensive strength of our Alliance.

The Canadian Government will be glad to give very careful thought to these proposals; they must, of course, be tentative, because, as Mr. Herter has said, to implement at least some of them would require legislation by the United States Congress.

We were very glad to have them, and, as I have said, Mr. Chairman, we will give them the most careful consideration, but we do suggest that these proposals should not be used to blow up this question and these suggestions as the great issue before this present meeting, and it certainly should not be the case that the story goes out to the press that decisions have been made on these proposals at this meeting.

These decisions cannot be made until the governments have had full opportunity to consider the proposals.

SECRET

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE
DECEMBER 17, 1960

Mr. Chairman:

This is the first occasion on which I have been present as a Defence Minister at a NATO meeting and may I say that I have been deeply impressed with the earnestness and spirit of co-operation evident in the discussions of the important matters before the Council. This spirit, which I am sure will be carried over into the further examination of various proposals and problems will, I believe, result in timely and effective solutions. It is apparent that, from the standpoint of seeking solutions, these problems fall into two rather distinct categories. On the one side, we have those problems which require initially a co-ordinated agreed approach by all the NATO partners. Some of these have been aired at this meeting of the Council and I wish to single out later one or two which I believe merit special attention.

The other category of problems are those which face the NATO partners as individual nations and which are susceptible to solutions through whole-hearted acceptance of individual nations' responsibilities. I have particularly in mind here those aspects of the Annual Review which indicate a wide degree of variance in the progress which individual countries of the Alliance are making in their contribution towards the overall force goals.

While the Annual Review spares no one of us completely, examination of the country chapters does reveal a great difference in progress towards accepted goals. Clearly the NATO partners must concentrate on those aspects of NATO defence for which they have individual responsibility if we are to bring about a collective improvement in our NATO defence system.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, there are other important and complex problems to be faced together — problems for which solutions must be found in concert, but in the fundamentally important field of our force goals, the responsibilities of individual nations are clear-cut and inescapable.

I may assure you that Canada intends on her part to continue to discharge her responsibilities effectively in this field. I have noted with gratification the satisfaction expressed by the Supreme Commanders in the Annual Review, regarding the uniformly high state of readiness and effectiveness of the Canadian forces committed to NATO. We fully intend to maintain this position and, as you are aware, are carrying out major programmes to equip these forces with up-to-date equipment. In this respect, I should like to say that Canada recognizes that she has accepted obligations to supply forces under NATO Command equipped with, and ready to use, the most up-to-date and effective weapons.

I do not wish to dwell further on specific Canadian measures towards reaching the accepted force goals. I should like, however, to mention with great gratification one important factor contributing in no small way to the efficiency of our Canadian personnel in Europe and that is, the favourable effect exercised on the morale of our men by the co-operation, assistance and plain friendliness of the officials and people of our NATO allies.

Only a few weeks ago, I visited the units of our air division and our Brigade Group and, in speaking to our officers and men, it was apparent how deeply this friendly attitude had impressed them. Nothing could be more effective in demonstrating how worthwhile has been our active participation in this Alliance and I wish to convey our deep appreciation for this to all of our NATO partners and particularly, of course, to the countries in which our units are stationed.

I should like to touch upon one other matter, which we feel very strongly has an important bearing on the ability of the individual partners to attain their force goals and on the ability of the Alliance to make effective use of the forces at its disposal. I refer here to the matter of standardization. Standardization not only of equipment but also of procedures. Mr. Strauss, I was glad to see, brought up this question this morning. I do not wish to dwell on this matter in detail but I do feel most strongly that we must make a more wholehearted effort to achieve real progress in these fields.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

L'OTAN ET LE MONDE LIBRE
NATO AND THE FREE WORLD

224. H.C.G./Vol. 10

Note de l'ambassadeur en République fédérale d'Allemagne

Memorandum by Ambassador in Federal Republic of Germany

CONFIDENTIAL [Bonn], September 8, 1960

NATO AND THE FREE WORLD

The Task of the 1960s

1. NATO must in the sixties develop and maintain greater military and economic strength, moral purpose and internal unity if it is to continue to deter aggression by the Russo-Chinese bloc and if the fabric of the North Atlantic Community is to be further strengthened. This memorandum is concerned with the danger that we shall fail to achieve this dual purpose unless we are very clear in our own minds about the nature of the most critical international problems of the sixties.

2. My contention in this memorandum is that many, if not a majority, of these critical problems are not in their pith and substance aspects of a contest with Communism or with the Russo-Chinese bloc, that for such problems the NATO Council is not generally the most effective primary organ for consultation and coordination of policy, and that it would be dangerous to use it as such. This does not mean that NATO should not concern itself with these problems. Indeed the contrary is true. But it does mean that NATO must not try to set itself up as a sort of directorate of the free world.

3. The reason I believe it would be dangerous for NATO to try to do this is that this would make difficult or even impossible success in the task of creating and preserving in the sixties a high degree of unity, prosperity and personal freedom within the whole of the free world, whether it is coloured or white, underdeveloped or developed, Asian or European, African or American or Australian. The imperative task of the sixties is, I submit, to create and preserve that kind of unity, prosperity and freedom, for without it the mastery of the world will before long rest with the Russo-Chinese bloc. While therefore I believe that a ten year plan for NATO is needed, I also believe that a ten year plan for NATO is not enough. What is most needed is a ten year plan for the free world.

4. Such a plan should be based on a functional and pragmatic approach to world problems. I mean by this that at one time for a particular subject one agency would be used as the principal vehicle for consultation and common action within the free world, at another time or for another subject another agency would be used, and that each agency would be strengthened to the extent necessary for it to carry out its tasks. Canada is peculiarly fitted to play a major role in this kind of functional and pragmatic approach to world problems. This provides Canada with an opportunity and a challenge.

The Main Problems of the 1960s: Their Nature.

5. It is not easy to select out of the many important problems which are likely to confront us in the sixties, those which will probably prove to be the most critical. The following is my list:

(1) How to minimize the dangers to the free world created by the rise of China to the rank of a first-class power;

(2) How to organize effective help to India to speed up its economic development;

(3) How to prevent independent Africa south of the Sahara from relapsing into chaos and how to facilitate the orderly progress of the remaining dependent territories in Africa (including Angola and Mozambique) to independence;

(4) How to deal with the population explosion;

(5) How to work out equitable international arrangements under which the Western industrialized countries will each accept its fair share of a rapidly increasing flow of low-priced manufactured goods from the under-developed countries;

(6) How to work out effective international agreements to reduce the dangers resulting from the development of methods of mass destruction;

(7) How to maintain an effective balance of military power with the Russo-Chinese bloc; and

(8) How to reduce the dangers created by the division of Europe into a Soviet Zone and a Western Zone, particularly the division of Germany and of Berlin.

6. These problems are, of course, related. They exacerbate each other. But even if Communism did not exist, if Russia and China did not exist, or if Russia and China were liberal democracies, would not many of those problems be intractable and endanger the peace and welfare not only of the advanced countries but of the whole world? Is not this, for example, true of the problems of India and of Africa? Would not the present explosive growth in the population of the world, the difficulty in obtaining acceptance by Western nations of cheap manufactured goods from underdeveloped countries, and the control of methods of mass destruction constitute serious problems? While problems like these have significant implications for the struggle between the Russo-Chinese bloc and NATO, surely they have their core and origin in circumstances not directly related to that struggle.

Some Possible Methods of Tackling the Main Problems of the 1960s

7. Another way of approaching this question is to ask ourselves, in respect of some of the main international problems of the sixties, what agency or channel is inherently most appropriate in each individual case for consultation and for the formulation of agreed policies.

8. Take, for example, the problem of China. The two large countries of the free world which are most directly and immediately concerned by the growing might of China and the recklessness of its policies, which are indeed in clear and present danger from China, are India and Japan. They also have special knowledge of China. Without their cooperation it would be difficult if not impossible to work out and implement a common free world policy calculated to reduce to a minimum the dangers of China to the free world. Japan and India are proud countries; they are constantly suspicious that, just because they are coloured, the West is not treating them as equals. Are we not more likely to secure their full cooperation if they are treated from the beginning as equal in status with the Western powers principally concerned — the United States and Great Britain? Once there is a possibility of fruitful discussions on a new free world policy to China, would it not therefore be wise for these four powers to consult together, each of course keeping its special friends and associates and allies informed through NATO, SEATO, CENTO, the Commonwealth and the African-Asian group?

9. Then there is the problem of organizing effective help to India to speed up its economic development. This is a difficult and delicate problem, for if the aid is to be most helpful it must be accompanied by friendly constructive advice and it is not easy for a poverty-stricken, coloured, proud and sensitive country with an ancient civilization and a rich culture to take advice from wealthy, white donor nations. At present the principal agency which is being used for the purpose of organizing advice and aid to India is the International Bank, aided by a consortium of the principal potential givers of aid acting under the Bank's auspices. India has become accustomed to dealing with the International Bank and the consortium. Should not the Bank and the consortium remain therefore as the principal agencies for coordinating free world policy on aid to India?

10. As for the problem of trying to prevent Africa south of the Sahara from relapsing into chaos, is it not likely that the chances of the political leaders of the non-white part of the free world, and particularly the leaders of Africa, cooperating in a sensible policy would be diminished if they thought that this policy had originated in discussions in the North Atlantic Council? For they are suspicious of a Council which includes so many colonial or ex-colonial powers having what in their eyes are dubious records in dealing with colonies or former colonies. Thus they consider that Belgium committed grave errors by not training the Congolese for self-government and that Portugal is continuing to commit similar and even grosser errors in Angola and Mozambique. They do not have a high opinion of the Dutch record in dealing with the Dutch East Indies when it was still a colony or with Indonesia after it became independent. They are still reserving judgment on France because, to offset its recent generally good record in black Africa, there are the armed struggles which it has waged in the past fifteen years in Syria, Indo-China and North Africa. It seems evident that the agencies of the free world which are most likely to be able to work out a policy on Africa which will carry with it the judgment of the bulk of the free world, both white and coloured, are the Commonwealth, the International Bank and the United Nations in its various aspects, especially the Special Fund under Mr. Hoffman, the expanded programme of technical assistance and a U.N. police force. Already the United Nations has in the summer of 1960 demonstrated in the Congo that it can in Africa act as the executive agent of the free world.

11. There are probably two main aspects of the problem of the explosion of the population of the free world. The first is to discover a cheap, reliable, safe, oral contraceptive or a vaccine giving temporary sterility. The second is to persuade people to use it. The North Atlantic Council is peculiarly unfitted to deal with either of these problems. In the first place most of the countries represented on the Council have large Roman Catholic populations and the Roman Catholic church appears to be resolutely opposed to the use of contraceptives. Secondly, the countries in which it may be most difficult to persuade people to use contraceptives are the Asian and African countries. The task of working out effective methods of persuasion had best be left to the governments of those countries, acting perhaps in consultation with each other, or through some agency which they themselves have been instrumental in setting up. Hindus, Muslims, Buddhists and pagans are not likely to welcome the intervention of white people from Christian countries in so delicate and intimate a matter.

12. A major international trade problem of the sixties will be to work out equitable international arrangements under which Western industrialized countries will each accept its fair share of a rapidly increasing flow of low-priced manufactured goods from under-developed countries. Here the countries which are most capable of leading the way to a solution of the problem would appear to be the four leading world traders.— the United States, Great Britain, Germany and Canada. Though these countries are all members of NATO, the question still arises whether they should consult in the first instance or primarily with their fellow members of the NATO Council or whether GATT or the International Bank would not be more appropriate forums.

13. This kind of examination of five major international problems of the sixties demonstrates, it seems to me, that the list of agencies most suitable for undertaking primary responsibility for dealing directly with problems of this type may be extensive but can scarcely be regarded as including NATO. This in turn suggests that it would be unwise for Canada and the other members of NATO to provide any grounds for a belief that they propose to use the NATO Council as a sort of directorate of the free world, a forum for the general determination of policies to be carried out by them through NATO or other agencies as may be deemed expedient but decided nevertheless by the NATO powers in the NATO Council. The five problems examined above, and others like them, have of course significant implications for NATO's efforts to develop and maintain greater military and economic strength, moral purpose and internal unity in order that it may continue to deter aggression by the Russo-Chinese bloc and further strengthen the fabric of the North Atlantic Community. Exchanges of views upon various aspects of problems of this kind should therefore take place in NATO from time to time, and such exchanges may on occasion include the examination of possible or proposed courses of action by one or more of the members of NATO. But it is essential that when such discussion does take place in the NATO Council it should not rest on the false assumptions that, because these problems have a bearing on the struggle between the Russo-Chinese bloc and NATO, they are in their essence part of that struggle, that the North Atlantic Council should therefore take the lead in working out possible solutions and that, if the lead is taken in some agency other than NATO, the legitimate concerns of NATO are likely to receive less than adequate attention.

14. For many problems it seems clear that it would be wiser if the lead were to be taken not by NATO but either by some other international agency or by an ad hoc group of those free countries, whether members of NATO or not, which are especially concerned with the problem, have special knowledge of it, or are in an especially good position to help implement an agreed policy. To attempt to use NATO as the principal free world agency for dealing with all problems which impinge on the struggle between the Russo-Chinese bloc and NATO, would greatly lessen, if not eliminate, the possibility that the two main parts of the free world — the North Atlantic and the coloured — could work in harness.

The Basic Prerequisites of Free World Unity.

15. It is going to be extremely difficult to maintain within the free world during the sixties a degree of unity on the main international problems sufficiently great to enable the free world to hold back Russo-Chinese expansionism. The problems of the sixties will be difficult enough no matter how well they are handled. They will be insoluble unless all the countries which are in a position to help significantly lend their active cooperation and support. Countries such as India, Japan, Pakistan, Egypt, Nigeria, Brazil and Mexico can give significant help. But they are far more likely to cooperate in implementing a free world policy if they have a sense of having participated fully and as equals in the decision-making process which finally led to the formulation of that policy.

16. In order to secure their active cooperation two things are necessary. The first is for the Western powers to make clear that they do not believe that all the main problems before the world are aspects of a struggle against Communism. The second is for the main Western powers to treat the other principal countries of the free world as their equals in consultation on problems in which their concern is at least equal to that of the West.

17. In my farewell despatch from Delhi in May of 1957 I emphasized these two points in relation to India. They have a wider application. I then said: "They [the Indians] argue that it is an extreme simplification of a highly complicated problem to present the problem before the world as Communism versus anti-Communism. Equally important are the demands of colonial peoples for self-government, the demand of coloured races for racial equality, the revolt of two-thirds of mankind against its poverty, its disease and its illiteracy. All these, they say, have created a revolutionary ferment in Asia and Africa. How to deal with this ferment is [in their view] as important or more important than how to deal with Communism."

18. I went on to say that India interpreted "a failure to consult India on an issue which is important to India and to Asia not merely as a snub to Nehru but as a snub to India and as demonstrating a failure to recognize the importance of Asian opinion and the profound changes which have taken place in Asia since the war as a result of a revolutionary ferment born of nationalism and an urge for economic betterment."

19. Moreover the NATO countries do not possess a monopoly of wisdom. On many issues the policies formulated for the consideration of the free world would probably be a good deal sounder if the appropriate non-NATO members of the free world as well as the appropriate NATO members had participated as equal partners in their formulation.

Hazards to Free World Unity

20. Canada has been apprehensive lest the establishment by the United States, Great Britain and France of a tripartite directorate or the development of increased political consultation among the six members of Little Europe might reduce Canada to the rank of a second-class member of NATO. The fact that we have this apprehension should make it easier for us to comprehend the kind of apprehensions which countries like India, Japan, Pakistan, Egypt, Nigeria, Brazil and Mexico would have if they thought that NATO was trying to arrogate to itself the role of a sort of political directorate of the free world. Such apprehensions have indeed already arisen on various occasions; already there is to a disturbing degree a sense of separation between the NATO group of powers and other large sections of the free world, surpassing a difference of view on specific and limited and practical questions of policy. This uneasy relationship has been a characteristic of the 1950's which it would be naïve not to recognize, and at critical times it has become strained almost to breaking point. A vital task of the sixties is not only to prevent a further separation but to nurture and consolidate the rather limited confidence which major sections of free world opinion have at present in the collective behaviour of NATO powers. In these circumstances it would be disastrous for the NATO powers, in approaching problems not essentially the concern of NATO as such but rather of various free countries including NATO members, to flaunt their NATO hats.

Consultation: The Choice Among Available Agencies

21. The strains already existing in the relations between the NATO powers and other important countries of the free world would not be lessened — they would indeed be increased — if NATO were, as has been suggested, to build up stronger links with SEATO and CENTO for these two organizations include only one country, Pakistan, of the leading non-white members of the free world. The chances, therefore, of the United States, Great Britain and their Western associates carrying with them the non-white countries of the free world would be even further diminished if the NATO powers were to give to the members of SEATO and CENTO a preferred position in consultations on world problems.

22. Moreover any such development would subject the Commonwealth to a strain which might become almost intolerable. India, Malaya, Ceylon, Nigeria and Ghana are outside of NATO, SEATO and CENTO, and all are quick to conclude, if they are excluded from consultation on a matter of concern to them, that it is because of their colour. These countries have three-quarters of the total population of the Commonwealth.

23. May I emphasize again the principal point which I made in my memorandum of last October on "Canada and the strengthening of the new Commonwealth."[83] I then said: "The task of strengthening the links between the members of the Commonwealth is one of great difficulty and delicacy. There are many obstacles to be avoided. Thus there must be no impression given that the four white members consider themselves superior to the coloured members or that they belong to an inner group in the Commonwealth. The newer members are touchy about their newly acquired independence. They must be persuaded that a stronger Commonwealth does not diminish their independence; that instead it adds to their influence ... The one essential requirement of greater Commonwealth unity is greater Commonwealth consultation, and greater exchange of information among Commonwealth countries. The motto of the new Commonwealth must be "consult, consult, consult." This is a principle which members of the Commonwealth readily affirm but the reality of the consultation which in fact takes place among the members of the Commonwealth is often remote from the ideal."

24. The free world has many agencies for the exchange of information, for consultation on policy, for working out common programmes of action. NATO is only one of these many agencies. There are also the Commonwealth, the Colombo Plan, the International Bank, the International Monetary Fund, GATT, OECD, the Organization of American States, and, as the Congo crisis has recently demonstrated, the U.N. and the specialized agencies in certain of their aspects. What is required to unite the free world on wise courses of action in the sixties is increased consultation, coordination and common action within all of these agencies and where appropriate agencies do not exist to deal with a certain problem a temporary ad hoc group of states can be informally called together.

25. The essential point is for the North Atlantic countries not to consider the North Atlantic Council as the exclusive agency for consultation among them on world problems, or even as always the most important agency; not to consider that the North Atlantic Council is the agency in which preliminary discussion should necessarily take place; not to assume that discussion in the North Atlantic Council should necessarily lead to a common attitude or a common policy or common action.

26. The tidy pattern of increased consultation within NATO might have been an appropriate prescription for the fifties. It is not appropriate for the sixties. Increased consultation within NATO which is not accompanied by increased consultation within those agencies which are composed of a representative group of nations of the free world both white and coloured could endanger our peace and security.

Some Thoughts for the Future

27. A ten year plan for NATO is needed. But a ten year plan for NATO is not enough. Indeed unless it is accompanied by plans to strengthen other international agencies of the free world, a ten year plan for NATO may frustrate the very purposes we have in view. What is most needed is a ten year plan not for NATO but for the free world.

28. The free world's chances of survival are increased the more united it becomes, the more prosperous it becomes in all its parts, the more personal and political freedom there is in all its parts. The primary task of the sixties is to create and maintain within the free world ever greater unity, prosperity and freedom. The pursuit of this objective will at times require sacrificing unity within NATO in order to secure the cooperation in a workable solution of the governments most directly concerned and a wide measure of support throughout the free world. This has recently happened in respect of the Congo. It is certain to happen again.

29. The time is not ripe for trying to build a constitutional or institutional structure for the free world. But the time is ripe for driving down to bed rock the pilings on which a constitutional structure of the free world could eventually be built. Most of the existing international agencies for free world consultation, cooperation and common action can be made into pilings for such an eventual free world structure.

30. What is required is a functional and pragmatic approach to the solution of the world problems of the sixties. What we should do in the next few years is to feel our way forward using for a particular subject at one time one agency as the chief organ for consultation and common action within the free world and at another time or on another subject another agency, sometimes having the preliminary consultation in one, sometimes having the preliminary consultation in another. We should strengthen each agency to the extent necessary for it to carry out its tasks. Perhaps out of this kind of functional and pragmatic approach there may gradually emerge during the sixties the outline of some institutional or constitutional structure for the free world as a whole.

Canada's Role

31. Canada is peculiarly fitted to play a major role in this kind of approach to a solution of the main world problems for Canada's associations within the free world are rich and varied. Canada is, for example, one of the leading members of NATO, the Commonwealth, the Colombo Plan, GATT, the OECD, the International Bank, the Monetary Fund, I.C.A.O. and F.A.O. There are few nations in the free world which rank among the leading members of so many important agencies of the free world. This provides Canada with an opportunity and a challenge.

32. Canada has this year given a welcome impetus to moves to strengthen NATO. Last year it gave a successful impetus to moves to strengthen the International Bank and the Monetary Fund. Now it has an opportunity to give an impetus to the strengthening of the other agencies of the free world. Strong winds of change will be blowing through Washington after the election. If Ottawa now launches the free world on a new course, the winds from Washington may carry it safely to port.

L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis
à l'ambassadeur en République fédérale d'Allemagne

Ambassador in United States to Ambassador in Federal Republic of Germany

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, October 4, 1960

Dear Escott [Reid],

Your personal note of September 14† arrived just a little before your Despatch No. 701, dated September 12.[84] I have now read the Despatch with pleasure and profit and shall make two or three comments which may be of interest as coming from this harried capital although they will possess little originality.

In the first place, let me say that your memorandum is a good one. It is thoughtful, fresh and untrammelled by the customary detail in which most such papers bog down. You have put it in the frame of "NATO long-term planning" and this is fair enough but its chief value is that it proposes not so much a plan as a philosophical and practical approach to all our international relationships.

I entirely agree that the NATO Council is not the best place for consultation and coordination of all policy for the free world and I am attracted by what you call "a functional and pragmatic" procedure in the choice of the international groupings best suited to the main problems of the sixties and beyond. The evidence so far is that NATO is having great difficulty in looking after its own primary (and geographically restricted) responsibilities. What is first needed in the N.A.T.O. Council is a thoroughgoing re-examination of Western defence policy including the nuclear arm and the taking of decisions to bring up to date the doctrine and practice in defence of the North Atlantic area. There are great difficulties in this restricted area and discussions in the Council so far do not encourage one to think that early solutions will be found.

De Gaulle's idea of a directorate for NATO, his triumvirate, who will roam over the rest of the world as well in their planning, is quite hopeless. If the other nations were to agree, which they will certainly not do, the results would be what you foresee.

I do not think that I would make the same list as you have of the main problems of the sixties and I would probably put them in a different order but I agree, of course, that your eight are among the most serious and that they and others are most likely to be capable of solution outside, but in relationship to, NATO. I shall not attempt to comment on your particular procedures for particular problems. There would be different views as to the best forum in many cases but, I repeat, I like the approach — pick the most appropriate to the problem, having in mind the special sensitivities and interests of non-NATO countries, uncommitted as well as "Western."

It is especially true in this country that people tend to see every international problem, and even some domestic ones, in terms of the struggle between Communism and freedom and it is, of course, also true that, even where the issues are intrinsically otherwise, the competition and conflict between the two philosophies affect the attitudes of governments as well as peoples on all or virtually all international questions. In the USA, this factor is certainly in the course of affecting very directly the battle between the candidates. Last week, the first round in "the great debate" was devoted to domestic policy; but Mr. K. or Communist imperialism were brought in on both sides, and in almost every context. I wouldn't be surprised if it were somehow dragged into the World Series which opens today.

This kind of oversimplification of all major issues is, of course, to be deplored for it tends to distort and even prevent objective judgment and often to prejudice and frustrate efforts at solution. But the pervasive colour and influence of the ideological conflict is there and there is nothing to be gained by pretending it is not.

I am afraid that I cannot accept your proposition that Canada, in present circumstances, is "peculiarly fitted" to play any "major role" in a strategic redeployment of the free world despite our membership in and association with the principal world organizations. There has been a considerable change in the world community in recent years and in our own position and it is my impression that, for a variety of reasons, Canadian opportunities for successful initiative are not so auspicious nor so frequent as at an earlier and simpler post-war stage. This is not to say that we do not have chances of making our views heard nor that our voice has no persuasive power. I would certainly favour our "tactical" use of your functional and pragmatic approach but I would be very dubious of any measure of success in any attempt on our part to launch any general campaign.

You speak of strong winds of change blowing through Washington after November 8. You may be right but it is at this moment far from certain whence the breezes will come or whither they will go. I am not sure that third parties, whatever their predilections, can draw much comfort from the campaign so far.

These are random and uncoordinated thoughts. I would much prefer to talk with you but I suppose that is unlikely for a while yet.

Thanks for your reference to my feeling better. I am. In fact, for the first time in a year now, in fact since we were together in Paris, I have felt completely normal for the last three weeks.

Our affectionate regards to you both.

Yours ever,

A.D.P. HEENEY

PREMIÈRE PARTIE/PART 1

CONVERSATIONS ENTRE LE PREMIER MINISTRE ET LE PRÉSIDENT, WASHINGTON, 3 JUIN 1960
PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATIONS WITH THE PRESIDENT, WASHINGTON, JUNE 3, 1960

226. H.B.R.

Note d'une conversation avec le Président des États-Unis

Memorandum of Conversation with President of United States

SECRET [Ottawa], June 9, 1960

PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT EISENHOWER, JUNE 3, 1960

The Prime Minister and the President had approximately one hour's private conversation before officials were called in. This memorandum, which should be read in conjunction with Mr. Bryce's memorandum of June 4,[1] records the information which the Prime Minister gave me on June 8 concerning the private part of the conversation.

Interceptors and the CL-44[2]

The Prime Minister said that he had told the President that the figure of $105 million which the United States had set as the purchase price for 66 F-101B aircraft was unreasonably high. The President said that he had been given to understand that, bearing in mind the high cost of modern aircraft, the figure quoted for the F-101B was not unreasonable. He hoped that he had not been misled and would take steps immediately to discover how that figure had been arrived at. It was at this point in the conversation that General Goodpaster was called in and asked to secure details (see Mr. Bryce's memorandum for Goodpaster's report later in the conversation).

The Prime Minister said that in speaking about the F-101B he had not intimated to the President that the Canadian Government would necessarily close a deal involving the F-101B and the CL-44 even though a good bargain could be made. The Prime Minister said that officials might follow the matter up with the United States authorities with a view to determining the extent to which the purchase price for the F-101B might be scaled down from $105 million.

Exercise "Sky Shield"

The Prime Minister said that the President neither agreed nor disagreed with the position taken by the Canadian Government on Exercise "Skyhawk."

---

[1] Voir le prochain document./See the next document.

[2] Voir 4e partie, section (c) de ce chapitre./See Part 4, Section (c) of this chapter.

The President had said that the United States Government attached importance to these exercises because there was no other way in which continental air defences could be thoroughly tested. After remarking that he had genuinely tried to remove the causes of disagreement between the Canadian and United States Governments, the President said that the matter of "Sky Shield" was one for the Canadian Government to decide. He hoped, nonetheless, that a decision would be forthcoming soon, and it was agreed that the Canadian Government would make its decision known to the United States Government by the middle of June.

Acquisition of Nuclear Weapons

The Prime Minister said that there had been a brief general reference on both sides to this matter. He had emphasized that the Canadian Government could not be placed in the position of having nuclear weapons "unless we exercise joint control" on the basis which prevails in the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister said that the President's reply had seemed to indicate that he did not expect that a solution of this problem (possibly the general problem of making nuclear weapons available to other allies) would be found during his term of office. The President expressed a cautious hope that in time it would become possible for some Canada-U.S. arrangement to be made which would not give rise to the spread of nuclear weapons to other states.

U-2 Incident

The Prime Minister said that in the President's comments on the U-2 incident there had been no suggestion whatever that the United States had been in the wrong. In the course of the discussion, the President said that he had had no alternative but to admit personal responsibility for the U-2 flight once Khrushchev had stated publicly that the President might not have been aware of it. Unless he had admitted personal responsibility, he would have been criticized for not being master in his own house. The President said that the decision to admit personal responsibility had been his own decision.

NATO Heads of Government Meeting

The Prime Minister said that President Eisenhower was "all for" a Heads of Government Meeting of NATO and even thought he would like to attend it himself if it were to be held before the end of his term and in Canada. He could not, however, go to Europe.

Miscellaneous

Speaking of Mr. Khrushchev, the Prime Minister said that he had been disturbed by Khrushchev's conduct which was becoming "irrational." He did not believe that Mr. Khrushchev had any thought of deliberately provoking a war. The President said that while the Soviet Union was inclined to boast openly of its achievements in the field of missile production, he did not think that the West need regard these boasts as a deliberate threat to the peace in present circumstances. He might feel a sense of danger if the Soviet stockpile of missiles reached 1600.

In another comment on the possibility of future war, the President remarked that war by intercontinental missile was "a very uncertain thing." There were all sorts of possibilities of unsuccessful firing. The President remarked in this context that the United States ICBM had reached a range of 9000 miles and that it had landed "within yards" of its target.

NOTES ON THE DISCUSSION IN PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S OFFICE, JUNE 3RD, 1960

About four o'clock, Mr. Herter, Mr. Merchant, Mr. Wigglesworth, Mr. Heeney, Mr. Bryce and Mr. Robinson were invited into the President's Office where he and Mr. Diefenbaker had been talking for somewhat over an hour. Later Brigadier General Goodpaster, Staff Secretary to the President, came in and was present for perhaps half an hour before giving some information the President had been seeking.

The President indicated to us that he and Mr. Diefenbaker had discussed a number of matters and that they had sent for some information about the prices of the F-101B aircraft which General Goodpaster would bring in subsequently. The President said that he felt sure the prices that they had mentioned were not unreasonable because his recollections were that all fighter aircraft in the past decade have always cost over $1 million apiece.

Mr. Diefenbaker then mentioned the President's open skies proposal which he was intending to put before the United Nations and asked whether he would be prepared to have others join with the United States in sponsoring this proposal. The President said he thought that would be a good idea; Mr. Herter said the more the better and the larger the area covered in the offer the better. Mr. Diefenbaker then referred to the offer that Canada had made to the Russians in the past, contingent on the Russians making available like areas in their country for aerial inspection.[3]

Mr. Diefenbaker later referred back to this open skies proposal and asked if the President intended to present it himself to the United Nations. Mr. Eisenhower said that he did not intend to do so, that it was related to his own proposal of 1955 and he did not think it was necessary for him to put it forward personally. He went on to say that he had discussed this question of aerial inspection with de Gaulle in connection with the latter's proposals for including the means of delivery of nuclear weapons in the early stages of disarmament and had emphasized that this would mean detailed aerial inspection of Russia from Vladivostok to the Elbe. The President said that what they could now accomplish with aerial photography was simply amazing; he had shown on television a picture taken from fourteen miles up in the air that showed the six-inch stripes painted on a parking area.

The President then referred to the fact that they had been discussing the U.S. provision of wheat to India[4] and that the Prime Minister had expressed some concern that this would cause the Australians to have to divert wheat into other markets of interest to Canada. The Prime Minister said that he wholly appreciated that the United States had consulted Canada carefully on this matter and that many causes of friction had been removed in the whole question of surplus disposal of wheat. He felt there was danger, however, that this Indian transaction would re-open the possibilities of resentment in Canada over United States wheat disposals. He felt it could be removed by some sort of joint or parallel action in the field of surplus disposals. He mentioned that he had tried to have some sort of NATO food bank established but we had not been able to make much progress in that direction. Some limited arrangement with Norway had now been worked out.

The President asked whether there was any way to get our officials together to work out some common plan on surplus disposals and the discussion came back later to this subject. The Prime Minister mentioned our concern over disposals of surplus wheat in Latin America and Africa on credit terms which we could not hope to match. The President said that they would look into that particular aspect of the matter.

The President later returned to the subject again, saying that there were a great many hungry people in the world who cannot afford to buy food, yet we in North America have tremendous surpluses. He wondered what we could do about it. People around the world were wondering where we stood as a group of civilized Christian countries on this humanitarian problem. Mr. Diefenbaker suggested that perhaps we should work out a general plan to which we could each contribute some of our surpluses. The President said that it might be possible to do something along this line if he had the kind of majority in Congress that the Prime Minister had in Parliament. He went on to say, however, that perhaps we could work out some broader plan to use the surpluses of North America and other Western countries for aid to the countries that were in need. Reference was then made to the Food for Peace programme[5] and to the storage costs being incurred both by the United States and Canada in holding stocks of wheat. (There was fairly clear agreement that we should follow up to see whether there was some form of joint or parallel action that could be taken by the two countries, possibly with other Western countries, on the most useful disposition of surplus stocks.)

During the discussion on wheat, Mr. Diefenbaker interpolated a few remarks about uranium. Following the President's joking reference to the possibility of using wheat for nuclear weapons, the Prime Minister pointed out that we had a big surplus of uranium too, which caused us real difficulties. The position was quite different in regard to farm products where we had surpluses piling up that were really needed to feed the big increases that were now taking place in the world's population. The Prime Minister drew attention to the importance of preventing differences in economic interests from weakening the solidarity of the Western nations.

Turning to another subject, Mr. Diefenbaker said he felt something had to be done on a high level to re-assess the position of NATO, looking ahead some ten years. He said the press in Canada did not agree with him that the Alliance had been knit more closely together as a consequence of the collapse of the Summit conference. He felt it was important to re-examine our own Western situation. The President asked whether he was referring to the economic side of NATO and Mr. Diefenbaker replied that he was speaking in terms of the general position in NATO.

The Prime Minister went on to refer to the 1957 NATO meeting[6] and said that he felt there had not been enough preparations for it and that none of the Heads of Government there seemed to reflect in their speeches a knowledge of where NATO was really going. He was proposing to suggest that the time has now come where there should be another NATO meeting of the Heads of Government for the purpose of strengthening and projecting NATO.

At this point Mr. Herter mentioned that the United States had suggested at the Council a study of the future of NATO and had set up a task force of their own officials in Washington to work on it under the direction of Mr. Bouie. The Prime Minister asked if they had submitted any of their ideas yet to other members of the Alliance and Mr. Herter said no; he did not think they would have anything ready until the Fall but the task force would be glad to discuss the subject with Canadian officials who might be interested. Mr. Diefenbaker was interested to learn of this. He said that he might make reference to the desirability for such a re-assessment in speaking at DePauw University on Sunday.

The President then enquired why Canada did not invite NATO to meet in Canada. He thought we would probably have the accommodation available and be able to provide simultaneous translation facilities to cut down on the delays that there would be in translation. He said that he would be prepared to go along with the idea of a review but thought the officials should consult about it before the top people sat solemnly behind a table pontificating on the subject. Mr. Diefenbaker picked up this reference and said he felt the 1957 meeting had not been an effective one in reaching any decisions. Indeed, it had reminded him of a newly-elected village council. The President said that he felt the purpose of that meeting had not been to reach decisions but rather to strengthen morale within the Alliance at a time when this seemed to be required.

The Prime Minister then said that he and the President had spoken about the proposed programme for testing the seismic effects of underground explosions below the level of 4.75 on the seismic scale. The President said that no one seemed to have mentioned this to the Canadians and there was some question as to whether the United States had heard of the proposal to carry on some observations in Canada. He also said that there had been some confusion over proposed explosions of nuclear devices in the tar-sands of Alberta. There was a brief discussion about the facts on what had happened concerning this tar-sands project, and a reference to the Richfield Oil company (of which company the president was to be present at the dinner that evening). The Prime Minister went on to say that Macmillan had told him of the proposed seismic tests in connection with the moratorium on underground explosions and explained about the network of points in the United States from which observations of the effects of the explosions would be made.[7] Macmillan had asked if Canada would make available some twenty sites arranged in two lines at suitable distances. Both the President and Mr. Herter said that they had never heard of Canada being involved in this. Mr. Heeney said that he thought the scientists in the Defence Departments of the two countries had been in touch about it. Mr. Diefenbaker said he understood there were to be tripartite teams carrying out these tests — U.S., U.K., and U.S.S.R. — including some neutrals. The President said that he had understood that if the United States territory was not big enough itself to carry on the tests, there might be some advantage in making observations in other countries. He said that Mr. Macmillan was determined to get an effective plan worked out for putting an end to all kinds of nuclear tests. Mr. Bryce said that he understood that what had been proposed to Canada was a part of the United Kingdom element in the coordinated research programme, but the Prime Minister thought that it may have been intended to go beyond that.

The Prime Minister then said that he and the President had discussed the Sky Shield exercise. The President said that he understood that the Canadian Government was going to examine the proposal again in the near future, see what was involved in it and make a decision by the middle of June.[8] The Prime Minister confirmed that this would be done.

The President said that one problem he would like to see discussed is how Canada and the United States could prevent stories about their relationships being picked up at an early stage by newspapermen who got public opinion all upset before there had been a chance to deal with the question at issue. He said the newspapermen had fifty thousand sources of information and it was very difficult to prevent them finding things out. He thought it might be necessary to try to overcome this by the more effective indoctrination of our own people and by efforts toward even closer communication of our ideas to one another as quickly as possible. The Prime Minister said that he was concerned about the lack of Canadian news in the United States by comparison with the enormous amount of United States news in Canada. On the subject of communication of ideas and the resolution of difficulties, he thought the joint ministerial committees on economic affairs and on defence had proven very helpful. He also felt that the joint parliamentary committee had been very beneficial to Canada and hoped that it was to the United States. There was then some brief discussion of the concern that the Prime Minister of Japan had of the press accounts at the time of his visit to North America, particularly in Time Magazine.[9]

The Prime Minister asked if there was anything that should be said about the discussions on the development of the Columbia River. The President said he thought these discussions were going famously and there was no need to talk about them. Mr. Heeney said this ball was now in the Canadian court and the Canadian group was preparing for the next meeting. Mr. Eisenhower enquired about General McNaughton and his role in these discussions.

The Prime Minister raised several questions relating to Communist China, asking the President first whether he did not feel it would be necessary to include Communist China in agreements relating to nuclear tests or disarmament. The President said this would not be desirable right away but must be done later. The Prime Minister mentioned the fact that the Globe and Mail, who had pressed so for recognition of Communist China and had sent a correspondent out there, had now been forced to withdraw its bureau from China.

The Prime Minister asked whether there was any change in regard to the United States' attitude toward recognition of China, referring to the conversation that he and Mr. Eisenhower had had on this matter in Ottawa two years previously.[10] The President said that he had discussed this matter with Mr. Nash of New Zealand recently, who had raised it saying that New Zealand might have to recognize China fairly soon. The President said that he would be against recognition himself under present circumstances but that, even if he were in favour of it, he simply could not do it because of the attitude of the American people. Indeed, he thought it would wreck the United Nations, at least in so far as the United States was concerned, if Communist China were admitted to the United Nations. He said that the American people were quite emotional about the prisoners they can't get back from China — indeed much more concerned about that than over threats to Formosa or other places.

The Prime Minister went on to ask then whether the United States expected any aggressive action by China in Formosa or elsewhere in the East. The President replied to this by saying that he differed with the Secretary of State in regard to expressing views in public on this matter. Mr. Herter had been asked whether aggressive action might be expected in regard to Formosa and had spoken of it as a possible next trouble spot. The President himself felt it was not desirable to pin-point places where the Communist Bloc might cause trouble. He was in favour of simply saying that they will look for places and probe wherever they think that they can achieve some effect. He himself did not think, however, that the Chinese or other members of the Communist Bloc would try any real blow in the near future.

On this point the Prime Minister then enquired as to whether the United States expected any challenge to the freedom of access to Berlin. The President said that he did not expect such action by Mr. Khrushchev, not simply because he had said they would not do it but because he had referred to this so forcefully on some occasions and Mr. "K" was concerned about his own reputation. The President thought they might get the East Germans to annoy Western countries over access to Berlin. At this point Mr. Herter read out a press report of the answer

Khrushchev had given to a question on the matter that morning,[11] saying that if it appeared after another six or eight months that the West was not interested in a Summit meeting, then Russia would sign a peace treaty with East Germany which would put an end to the rights of access to Berlin of those countries that did not sign a treaty with East Germany, and if they tried to get to Berlin without signing such a treaty, then "we" would stop them. He emphasized the significance of the fact that the Russians seemed in this to imply that they rather than the East Germans would enforce the ban. The President said he did not think that the Russians intended deliberately to provoke the West to war in the near future. He thought that if Russia got two or three thousand missiles, they might then start some target practice but that this would not happen soon.

At this point, General Goodpaster supplied the information about the costs of the F-101B which had been requested. He had obtained through Mr. Gates' office an estimate of $1.6 million each, for a run of sixty-six, as the incremental fly-away cost of these last aircraft off the line. This did not include any spares, the cost of which could not be obtained quickly.

The President said that the United States was all ready and anxious to talk in detail about a transaction relating to these aeroplanes and they were not trying to be unreasonable in regard to the price. He asked if the Prime Minister would fix up arrangements for Canadian officials to discuss the matter further with the United States' authorities concerned and the Prime Minister said he would arrange for such further discussions. (The Prime Minister indicated later to Mr. Heeney that he had raised this question with the President including reference to the proposed acquisition by the United States of CL-44 aircraft.)[12]

At this point there was a brief intervention when the President received word that it had just been announced that Mr. Khrushchev had accepted an invitation to visit Cuba. The President thought that in doing this Mr. Khrushchev might be doing the United States a great favour as other Latin American countries will now see where the sympathies of Cuba lie.

The President turned from this to ask the Prime Minister when Canada was going to join the Organization of American States. The Prime Minister said that he had discussed this matter with the President of Mexico some weeks ago when he had been there. Previously Canada had felt that it was inappropriate, because of her position as a constitutional monarchy, to join an organization of republics. Moreover Canada did not want to be in more organizations, particularly those which might appear to clash with its interests in the Commonwealth. This argument, however, was not as strong as it used to be. With the large-scale development that is going on south of the Rio Grande and the growth in the population and importance of Latin American countries, Canada was going to have to reconsider its attitude on this question. Mr. Green was just back from Latin America and had been questioned as to why Canada remained aloof from the O.A.S. The President said that the United States was in lots of alliances and organizations now and indeed felt that such inter-connections were important. He had told the United Kingdom himself that they should get into Europe as effectively as possible.

The Prime Minister said to the President that he would not be surprised if Canada had an observer at the O.A.S. meeting next Spring. This limited action might seem like procrastination but it would be a step forward.

The President and Prime Minister then looked at the draft communiqué that had been prepared in advance by the others, and they both saw no objection to the three paragraphs that had been included. The President, however, again referred to the problem of how to manage public opinion and how to prevent the newspapers working up potential trouble spots into causes of friction between the two countries. The Prime Minister said that it was his impression that Canadian-American relations in the past couple of years had been very good and indeed had been unequalled in the past. The President then said that he would like to see reference in the communiqué to the fact that the two Heads of Government had reviewed the history of the past several years, were pleased that so many of their problems had yielded to the consultative process and they looked forward to the same processes helping further in securing the welfare of the people of the two nations. The Prime Minister felt that reference should be made to the process of consultation by visits, by the normal diplomatic channels, and by ministerial and parliamentary committees. The President, however, felt that it would not be well to spell out the reference to the parliamentary committee because of the constitutional position of the United States in regard to foreign relations. It was agreed that the others should incorporate these suggestions into the communiqué which should be put out on Saturday morning at the time the Prime Minister was leaving Washington.[13]

ANTI-AMERICAN SENTIMENT IN CANADA

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. [Washington, n.d.]

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATIONS WITH THE PRIME MINISTER IN OTTAWA, TUESDAY, AUGUST 30, 1960, AND WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 31, 1960

Tuesday, August 30

This morning I saw the Prime Minister to say good-bye — we are off to Washington again on Friday — and our conversation turned out to be more than a perfunctory exchange.

After enquiring about my health, the P.M. spoke at once about the CL-44 position[14] (Guest, of the Prime Minister's office, and Notman, of Canadair, had both telephoned me about this yesterday). Mr. Diefenbaker said that, in view of the position taken by the government at the time of cancellation of the Arrow, it would be "politically impossible" to make any deal which would involve the acquisition of U.S. fighters. He was most emphatic on this and categorical. The Government had attempted an alternative quid for the U.S. quo in the manning by Canadians of further radar in Canada, but Gates had turned this down. Had I "any ideas" as to anything else we might suggest to encourage the U.S. to buy CL-44s? It would be a helpful offset to public criticism of U.S. policies if the U.S. Government would place an order with Canadair. Pace and Notman were eager that he (the P.M.) should phone the President about this but Mr. Diefenbaker was reluctant to do so — it would inevitably "leak out."

I said that my impression had been that the U.S. would not buy CL-44s unless we were prepared to re-equip our home squadrons with modern (U.S.) interceptors. I could think of no

"fresh idea" which would induce them to do so though I would, of course, be glad to take the matter up when I returned to Washington if the P.M. wished me to.

Mr. Diefenbaker then went on to speak of what he characterized as "anti-Americanism" in Canada. Since we had last met, the state of Canadian opinion in this respect had deteriorated seriously. In his judgment, anti-American sentiment was now worse than at any time in his lifetime or mine. The P.M. characterized popular criticism of the U.S. as growing into an "avalanche." This was causing him the greatest concern. He would like the President to know about this situation and his own assessment of its gravity for he was anxious that there should be nothing done during the remainder of the Eisenhower Administration to exacerbate relations between Ottawa and Washington. (He expressed deep personal respect and friendship for Eisenhower — distaste for Kennedy and a favourable opinion of Nixon.)

When I questioned him as to the reasons for this growth of anti-U.S. sentiment in Canada, the P.M. said that it arose from:

(1) the widespread impression that the U.S. were "pushing other people around."

(2) distrust of the U.S. military and anxiety over the Pentagon's real intentions;

(3) the economic aggressiveness of U.S. interests; and

(4) the adverse trading position.

Mr. Diefenbaker went on to express his resentment of the lack of any appreciable notice of Canadian affairs in the U.S. press, radio and television. He spoke of the U.S. press representatives in Canada in disparaging terms — they were second-rate and tended to file only critical pieces on Canada and Canadian policies.

Mr. Diefenbaker referred to the severe criticism of the U.S. by the Opposition mentioning particularly Liberal defence policies and the highly critical statements of Mr. Pearson. The forthcoming Liberal meeting at Queen's would be an occasion for further outbursts against the U.S.

The Prime Minister told me that he based his assessment of Canadian sentiment on his own extensive correspondence and the opinions of Members of Parliament. All evidence from these sources pointed to an accumulation of resentment and criticism of the U.S. which would, he repeated, burst as an "avalanche" of unprecedented proportions. He would in all probability, at the next session, have to introduce legislation to compel U.S.-owned corporations to disclose financial statements. He hoped he would not have to initiate other measures aimed at U.S. interests.

I said that what the P.M. had told me alarmed me greatly. I had known that there had been differences and criticism in Parliament and in the press of the U.S. Government and of Americans. I had had no idea, however, that anti-Americanism had reached such proportions. Generally speaking, the economic or commercial relations between the two governments were — continued to be — good. There would, I thought, be no serious difficulty in Washington about restrictive legislation of an economic character such as the P.M. had mentioned. The most serious issues, in my opinion, arose in relation to joint defence where the U.S. were currently worried about our co-operation. For example, they were puzzled by our hesitancy to go along with them in such matters as nuclear storage. (Here the P.M. interrupted, comparing the Liberal policy of no nuclear weapons for Canadian forces and purely Canadian control with the government's concept of "joining control." Here nothing new emerged.) I said that I regarded the Canadian-U.S. alliance as "our most precious international asset," the loss of which in its traditional friendly working would be tragic for Canada. What could I do on my return to the United States to counteract the developments of which Mr. Diefenbaker had been speaking?

The Prime Minister again invited me to express any ideas I might have, asked me to think the problem over, especially in relation to the purchase of Canadian transport aircraft, and to speak to him again tomorrow.

Our talk lasted something over half an hour.

Wednesday, August 31

I had another long talk this afternoon with the Prime Minister — lasting nearly an hour between two and three o'clock while he ate his lunch after a long Cabinet session.

I reported that, after reviewing the CL-44 matter and referring to Washington, I remained of the opinion that the U.S. would only be interested in buying from us if we re-equipped the RCAF with modern U.S. interceptors. Mr. Diefenbaker said "All right, then, they'll go their road, and we will go ours."

The P.M. then, reverting to the main subject of our previous conversation, showed me a letter, which he characterized as "intelligent" and as summarizing well the "anti-American" feeling among Canadians of which he had spoken yesterday. This was from a "young Conservative" and it forecast serious difficulty for the party if it did not take greater account of the widespread anxiety and dissatisfaction felt by Canadians about U.S. nuclear policies and economic aggressiveness in Canada. The letter had been read with care and marginal comments made by Mr. Diefenbaker. It was quite clear that the letter had made a deep impression upon him.

The Prime Minister then went on to read from and show me a loose file of other letters, all of which were severely critical of the United States and U.S. policies and urged that the government take action to halt the process which was allegedly infringing our independence and involving us in the risk of nuclear war. There were a number of references to Canadian "neutralism" as a desirable policy and to getting out of NORAD, even NATO — the main emphasis being on detaching Canada from U.S. involvement. A good many of the correspondents referred to the American commercial and financial take-over of Canadian resources and all, in one way or another, deplored the erosion of Canadian sovereignty. Many were abusive of the U.S.; all were highly critical of U.S. international behaviour. Many were highly emotional. The folder from which these were drawn — which Mr. Diefenbaker said comprised only those received in August — might, I suppose, have contained about 50 letters, perhaps more. They were mostly hand-written.

The Prime Minister — on the other side — showed me an offensive letter from an American criticizing the Canadian government for the premium charged U.S. visitors on their dollar. Mr. Diefenbaker had had a draft reply to this prepared but had not sent it.

The Prime Minister observed many times as he went through this correspondence that I would now see what he meant by telling me yesterday of the extent and depth of the wave of anti-Americanism which was sweeping across the country from one end to the other. In that connection, he mentioned the influence of Minifie's book[15] urging neutralism for Canada (that "expatriate," "for whom Canada wasn't good enough"). Mr. Diefenbaker did not share Minifie's views but I could see, he said, that they had made an impression upon many Canadians and were widely shared. Many newspapers had expressed and were continuing to support similar opinions; he mentioned particularly The Globe & Mail, The Toronto Star, The Calgary Albertan, The Vancouver Sun.

Mr. Pearson, the Prime Minister continued, had avoided neutralism and had not gone so far as to advocate Canada leaving NATO. But the Leader of the Opposition must accept large responsibility for the resurgence of anti-U.S. sentiment in recent weeks and months. Mr. Diefenbaker returned to this several times and referred especially to recent speeches of LBP in and out of Parliament. If these views had been expressed by other Opposition leaders — Martin, Chevrier — they would not have mattered, but Pearson had great influence.

Another evidence of Canadian sentiment, Mr. Diefenbaker went on, was the close vote in the CCF Convention on Canada leaving NATO. Only the personal intervention of Coldwell and Tommy Douglas had prevented its passage. And read what Argue had said! This was a national convention with representatives from all over Canada.

When I observed that the policies advocated in the correspondence which the Prime Minister had shown me would surely strike at the very base of the U.S.-Canada relationship, to the enduring value and nature of which the P.M. had borne frequent public witness, Mr. Diefenbaker seemed to agree. Nevertheless, he kept coming back to the new and violent sweep of anti-Americanism throughout Canada. He wanted me to appreciate and understand the widespread nature and gravity of this. Further, he wanted the U.S. Administration to be aware of it. When I asked whether he wished me to express his estimate of these developments to those in authority in Washington, he said certainly — they should know how Canadians felt about these things.

I said that I had been very much worried by what he had told me yesterday and now reinforced today about Canadian public attitudes toward the U.S. and toward American policies. I was not too concerned about measures which the Government might feel compelled to take affecting the U.S. and Americans in the economic field such as laws requiring disclosure of financial information by U.S.-owned undertakings in Canada or even steps which the Government might decide upon for safeguarding industrial operations in Canada. If I were given instructions in advance, I would, I thought, have no serious difficulty in explaining such actions in Washington. What was in my mind much more serious was the Canadian position in relation to general political strategy and policy, in particular our attitude on joint defence and on the Western Alliance. My nightmare was that, under the buffetings and criticisms of her allies and what Americans regarded as the failure of support from other nations, the U.S. would revert to a neo-isolationist policy. Here Canadian attitudes and actions were of great importance because of our traditional relations. Recent and prospective technological developments were such (the ICBM) that the concept of "Fortress America" was becoming feasible again; there would be not much longer the same need for overseas bases and for U.S. troops and installations overseas; a policy of isolation for the U.S. would again become feasible. It would be tragic if this came about as a result of the disintegration of the Alliance and doubly so if we — who not long ago had despaired of the U.S. accepting large and continuing international responsibilities — had any part in bringing about such a result. The very people who were criticizing the government now for not standing up to the U.S. would be the first to complain if such a sorry development were to come about.

The Prime Minister again seemed to acquiesce in my argument and referred to his explanations and defence of the United States, notably in his speech to Parliament in New Delhi.[16]

There were, I went on, one or two other points I wished to make before I left. In my twenty-two years of connection, in one capacity or other, with Canada-U.S. affairs, there had never been in Washington an Administration which, first, knew more about Canada and Canadian affairs and, second, tried more to meet Canadian wishes, than the present one. (I instanced the President himself, Herter, Dillon and Merchant.) Here the Prime Minister agreed emphatically and spoke in high terms of his own relations with Eisenhower and his respect for the others I had mentioned.

In January, I continued, there would be a new Administration in the U.S. capital. Whichever party won, we would be confronted by those "who knew not Joseph." They would, for this reason and by reason of the individuals concerned, be much more difficult for us to deal with. This would not be my problem for I would be leaving Washington soon after the new President was inaugurated. (Here the Prime Minister interjected that it was understood that I should remain for only two years; I said that this was not my point — I would be willing to stay on a month or two after January 20 if that would be more convenient to the Government.) If it were not presumptuous, I would like an opportunity of expressing my views as to the kind of successor who should be appointed in the new circumstances — not the individual, of course, but the qualities that would be required of the Canadian representative in the new circumstances.

Finally, I asked, had the Prime Minister anything to say to me as to what I could do in this last phase of my mission toward the solution of the problem of current relations as he had described it to me? What could I do in Washington to alleviate the situation?

Mr. Diefenbaker had no particular instructions to give me, other than to repeat his judgment of the very grave extent of the recent increase in anti-American sentiment in Canada and to ask me to let the authorities in Washington know how seriously he regarded it.

As I left, the Prime Minister said that he valued these personal talks with me. He had earlier invited me to write him personally and privately when I had had an opportunity to assess the position after my return to Washington. This I undertook to do in a letter which he asked be marked "To be opened only by the Prime Minister" and sent special delivery.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL [Washington], September 14, 1960

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR POLITICAL AFFAIRS IN WASHINGTON, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1960

Soon after my return to Washington on September 6, I arranged to meet privately and at length with Livingston Merchant to discuss the problem which the Prime Minister had put to me in Ottawa on August 30th and 31st. Merchant and his wife dined with us at the Embassy last evening and, afterwards, I had something over two hours private and very frank conversation with him.

I began by communicating to Merchant very fully the substance of my conversations with Mr. Diefenbaker as recorded in the memorandum which I had drafted immediately after leaving the Prime Minister's office on August 31st. I said that Mr. Diefenbaker had asked me to inform U.S. authorities of his assessment of the recent growth and extent of anti-American sentiment in Canada and of his grave concern about it. Because of Merchant's own official position as well as his personal knowledge and experience of Canada, I had thought it best to speak first to him rather than to the Secretary of State; at a later date, I would wish to meet Mr. Herter on the subject. Meantime I would like Merchant to pass on to him the gist of what the Prime Minister had said to me.

After speaking along the above lines, I added a number of personal observations: I said that I thought most Canadians, despite the current critical attitudes to which the Prime Minister had referred, assumed that relations between our two countries were basically sound and friendly and would continue to be. To most Canadians any serious departure from this traditional relationship was literally unthinkable and unthought. The present discontent seemed to me to arise from two main sources: first, genuine anxiety at the possibility of nuclear war and, in that context, worry, even distrust, over U.S. military intentions and, second, the extent to which U.S. interests were acquiring ownership of key sectors of the Canadian economy. There was perhaps little or nothing that the U.S. Government could be expected to do about the latter; the process was essentially one of private funds finding their way into attractive investments of one kind and another. Nevertheless, this economic "invasion" had given rise to genuine alarm in Canada and demands upon Ottawa for counter-measures were growing in strength. As to the former, Canadians were not alone in criticizing any action or attitude in the United States which seemed provocative and as tending to increase the likelihood of nuclear disaster. In this critical and delicate area, as Merchant well knew, the policies and "posture" of the United States were scrutinized closely and were frequently criticized in Canada as elsewhere in the Free World.

Finally, I said that I was not asking Merchant to make any comment now upon the communication that I had made to him. He would probably want to reflect upon its significance and, perhaps after speaking to the Secretary, get in touch with me again. I would hope that he would be able to do so before long, at least in a preliminary way, because early next week I expected to discuss the matter with the Minister in New York.

In his immediate reactions, Merchant was not wholly taken aback by what I had said. Indeed it was clear that he had had some intimation of the Government's assessment of the present state of Canadian opinion. Nevertheless he did express very deep concern and was quite evidently impressed and greatly worried that the Prime Minister himself should have reached the conclusions I had expressed to him. He had had reports from the U.S. Ambassador in Ottawa containing similar appreciations; also the State Department, following the Canadian press as they did, had of course been aware of Canadian criticism in certain quarters of U.S. policies and attitudes. In this last connection, Merchant mentioned that only last week he had sent the Secretary two pieces from Maclean's of September 10, one by Newman,[17] the Ottawa editor, on anti-Americanism and the other an editorial on arming of Canadian forces with nuclear weapons.[18] On the other hand, there were other publications in Canada which took and expressed contrary opinions.

Merchant also referred to a private conversation which he had had recently with the Minister of Justice in Washington. Mr. Fulton had left him with the impression that Canada could not continue her present level of support for NATO and joint defence.

Turning to the subject of economic relations, Merchant asked if I did not agree that, as between the two governments, things had been going very well. The U.S. Administration had certainly been trying hard to meet the Canadian Government's difficulties in such matters as oil imports and other bilateral trading matters and he had thought that the result had been to remove most causes of friction. What I had said about U.S. private investment in Canada and our mutual commerce was, of course, quite another matter. (With this I agreed and repeated that the Prime Minister fully appreciated actions which the Administration had taken particularly in recent months and years to remove causes of irritation; this was not the area of current difficulty.)

Referring to the meetings of the Ministerial Defence Committee at the Seigneury Club in July,[19] Merchant said that he had left feeling that good progress had been made. Indeed he had assumed that on two of the principal questions, nuclear storage and the CL-44-F101 deal, virtual agreement had been reached. He had been surprised and puzzled that Cabinet approval in Ottawa had not swiftly followed. On the other hand, he had realized that certain provocative interventions by the Chairman of the U.S. Chiefs of Staff, and the presentation of the Secretary of the Treasury on proposed U.S. measures concerning Cuba had both received a cold and critical reception from Canadian Ministers.

Referring to the mention of American neo-isolationist sentiment in my conversations with the Prime Minister, Merchant expressed the view that the revival of serious popular and Congressional opposition to present U.S. policies was a real danger to which recent and current allied attitudes contributed greatly. In this the position and policy of Canada and the support of the Canadian people were of real importance.

Merchant said that I might be quite certain that the Secretary of State (and the President) would be very deeply concerned at the Prime Minister's assessment of current Canadian sentiment in relation to the United States. He would take the first opportunity of bringing what I had said to the attention of Mr. Herter. The problem was "what could be done about it?" He would like to take my suggestion that he reflect upon the problem and then communicate with me privately again. In the meantime, he repeated that he would, of course, communicate the sense of our conversation to the Secretary.

Finally, Merchant suggested that the opportunity should be taken of the presence next week at the U.N. of the Minister and the Secretary to get them together. Mr. Herter's commitments over this next week or ten days were very heavy but he felt sure that the Secretary would so arrange his schedule as to meet the Minister if Mr. Green could do likewise. I said that I felt certain that the Minister too would wish to see the Secretary and I would telephone Mr. Green this morning with a view to fixing some time when both could be free for a private talk in New York.

II. MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND THE MINISTER

September 20, 1960

At noon today the Minister and I called on the Secretary of State at his suite in the Waldorf Towers. The appointment had been made by Merchant, following our conversation of last week. Merchant was with Herter during our talk, as was Foy Kohler, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs (who made notes). The conversation lasted close to an hour which, with the timing of the appointment, seemed to me a pretty good indication of the importance attached by the Secretary to Canadian relations.

After talk of the U.N. Assembly, opening this afternoon, particularly in relation to Africa, Herter raised the question of current Canada-U.S. relations. (It seemed obvious to me that for the first twenty minutes or so he was giving Mr. Green the opportunity to speak first but the Minister declined to be drawn.)

The Secretary said that he had been receiving disquieting reports as to the state of Canadian opinion. He heard that there was among Canadians antipathy and antagonism toward the U.S. This, if accurate, disturbed him seriously, particularly at a time which was difficult and dangerous and when the U.S. was being battered severely elsewhere by those who did not know the U.S. so well. It would be a sad case if Canada and the U.S. were unable to get along together.

The Secretary added, not unkindly but nevertheless quite pointedly, that he hoped that the Canadian political parties would not enter into a competition in anti-Americanism and that any such tendency would not develop further and would be checked. Such a development could not but lead to serious consequences in our joint affairs.

Further, if his reports were true, Mr. Herter continued, they (the U.S. government) wanted to know "what 'they' could do about it." What were the causes of difficulty? He had been under the impression that the Administration had been — not unsuccessfully — working toward satisfactory solutions of Canadian-U.S. problems.

The Minister responded by saying that he did not think that things were so bad as the Secretary had been led to believe. Certainly there had been and continued to be a good deal of criticism of the U.S. and of Americans in Canada. But this had always been, more or less, a feature of Canadian life. He thought that it was to be attributed basically to the fact of our being a small nation living up against a powerful U.S. and to the resultant fear by Canadians of "American domination."

In the economic sphere, Mr. Green continued, there was and had been recently little or nothing in the policies or actions of the U.S. Government which gave us ground for complaint. (He did mention that actions by U.S. parent companies under U.S. regulations and of the U.S. anti-trust administration where Canadian companies were involved had caused some trouble. U.S. surplus products disposal practices were also referred to later.) Canadian concern in the economic area related rather to the extent and nature of private U.S. investment in and control of Canadian undertakings. This had created the impression that Canadian freedom of action, independence, was being limited. It was possible, that the Canadian government would have to introduce certain (unspecified) legislation to check and correct this process, for example so as to require certain percentage of Canadian control of certain types of operations.

The Minister said that he thought that our current difficulties arose not from economic issues but rather from another cause. Canadians "were not nearly so worried about the Russians" as were Americans. This was an important distinction between public opinion in the two countries as witness the fact that both parties in the current U.S. election campaign were harping on defence while in Canada there was no support at all for increased military expenditure.

Further, Mr. Green went on, the U.S. Administration's estimate of the actual risk of war seemed to be much gloomier than that of the Canadian government which tended to take a more optimistic view. Possibly, however, there was a distinction between the appreciation of the U.S. State Department and that of the Pentagon.

Mr. Green said that there was among Canadians a widespread feeling that nuclear war must be avoided. The U.S. Defense Department were thought by some to be courting such disaster by provocative words and actions. The U-2 incident had profoundly shocked Canadians. (Because it was "spying," asked Herter, "or because we admitted it?")

The Minister said that Canada had no desire to become another nuclear power. The government were opposed to the spread of nuclear military capabilities. His own personal view was that Canadian forces, in Canada at any rate (overseas formations might be different), should not be armed with nuclear weapons. He thought this was a position which would be widely shared in Canada.

Mr. Herter had suggested that defence cooperation between the two countries might have been hampered by a lack of coordination between Canadian military and civil authorities. Mr. Green felt this might have been so, e.g. in the first planning for "Sky Hawk."[20] At the same time, the Canadian military authorities had been very cooperative in our disarmament work, were perhaps less war-minded than their U.S. counterparts.

Despite these differences, the Minister agreed that relations between the two countries continued to be "as friendly and intimate" as it was possible for those of any two nations to be. He (Mr. Green) found that he could talk to U.S. officials as he could talk to those of no other country — "even the British." More than that, Canadians generally assumed close and friendly relations with Americans — as a matter of course. He would not worry too much about reports of anti-Americanism in Canada; the Conservatives had criticized the Liberal Government when in power for not standing up to the U.S.; now that the Liberals were in opposition, they were taking the same tack.

Reverting to his earlier question, the Secretary said what could the U.S. government, either of us, do to counteract the divergence between us? The Minister had no specific suggestion, but repeated that reports of anti-Americanism should not be taken too seriously; the situation remained fundamentally sound.

Brief reference was made to the CL-44 deal. I explained the present position as set out in my memorandum after my talk yesterday with the Secretary of the Treasury.[21] Mr. Green said that the matter had still to receive approval by the Canadian Cabinet.

In leaving, the Secretary said that after he returned to Washington, he would like to have a private talk with me over this whole subject. It was clear that Merchant had passed on the substance of our conversation.

On our way back, Mr. Green expressed the greatest admiration for Mr. Herter. He was a fine man — "completely the opposite of what Canadians expect an American to be!" The same went for Merchant.

The P.M. (in his talks with me), the Minister said, had exaggerated the situation. It was not as bad as that. "He should not have got 'these people' all upset." But Mr. D. was 'tired,' he added by way of explanation.

Memorandum from Ambassador in United States to Secretary of State for External Affairs

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. New York, September 22, 1960

Merchant and I had a brief telephone conversation last night (you had asked me to find out what I could about the Secretary of State's reaction to your talk with him Tuesday morning).

Merchant said that, although during your conversation, Mr. Herter had not expressed himself as emphatically as he might have, you could take it he was very seriously disturbed and concerned.

I have no doubt that I will be hearing more when the Secretary returns to Washington.

Incidentally, I told Merchant that I was to see the U.S. Secretary of Defense this afternoon on the CL 44 deal and that Cabinet had authorized a firm Canadian proposal. Merchant said that Mr. Herter would be glad to hear this.

I. MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH THE MINISTER

September 20, 1960

I saw the Minister last evening, September 19th, at his apartment at the Mayfair House, New York. We talked for two hours, between 9 and 11 — alone.

I began by recounting to him my two conversations with the Prime Minister, pretty well as set out in my memorandum (August 30 and 31), commenting here and there to illustrate my own estimate of U.S. policies and intentions and to point up my concern as to the grave effects for Canada, the Alliance — and the U.S. — of further weakening of the Canada-U.S. relationship.

Having explained the reasons why I had decided to adopt that procedure in carrying out the P.M.'s instructions, I then described to the Minister what transpired in my conversation with Merchant — pretty well as set out in my memorandum of September 14 from which I read.

Mr. Green listened closely as I talked, occasionally interrupting to examine in more detail points which I raised. His comments may be summarized as follows:

1. On the general question of "anti-Americanism" in Canada, he agreed with the P.M. that there was widespread criticism of the U.S. among Canadians. He agreed with my opinion that there were the two main sources — first, anxiety over the possibility of nuclear war and, in that context, distrust of U.S. military policy and, second, worries over American economic headway in Canada.

2. Of the two, the former was the more serious. Apart from occasional instances where U.S. government action involved consequences in Canada contrary to the Canadian policy (refusal to allow Canadian Ford to sell to Communist China),[22] the remedy for the economic problem lay with us, not with the U.S.

3. As regards defence, Canadians did not want to get involved in the nuclear competition between the U.S. and the Soviet Union. There was strong feeling that we should have nothing to do with nuclear weapons in Canada. This was at the root of the government's reluctance to sanction even storage on U.S. bases.

4. U.S. aggressiveness in international affairs, for example, the American attitude over Cuba. (The suggestion that we should cooperate in U.S. measures was totally unacceptable.)

5. Canadian opinion was widely divergent to American as to the threat of Soviet aggression (both political parties in U.S. in current campaign were contending for strengthened defences; the opposite was the case in Canada — a clear reflection of what Canadians thought).

6. It was quite true that the U.S. Government had met us on economic difficulties; there were no serious issues between the governments in this area.

7. His own view was that the P.M.'s estimate of the extent and depth of anti-Americanism in Canada was "exaggerated;" on the other hand, Mr. Diefenbaker was very good at appraising public sentiment and had sources which had proved reliable in the past.

On the specific matter of the CL-44s, I gave the Minister the memorandum which I had prepared that morning.† He read it and said he would have the Under-Secretary put this up to the P.M. for Cabinet decision. There had been sharp divisions among Ministers on this question. He himself remained opposed to our acquiring U.S. fighters; there was not only the political difficulty to which the P.M. had referred with me; he himself would be reluctant to see Canadian forces acquire aircraft which would eventually require nuclear armament (the 66 Canadian-manned 101's would simply replace U.S. fighters and result in moving the same interceptor element farther north). However, he would accept Cabinet's decision in this matter and I would be instructed precisely as to what I should say in Washington. There had been great pressure from various sources (Pace – Notman) for conclusion of a deal but, he repeated, the political consequences of any arrangement involving U.S. re-equipment of RCAF squadrons would be very serious.

I raised the matter of the MB-1 agreement and urged that prompt approval be given to this as one item which did not involve the considerations the Minister mentioned and might alleviate U.S. concern over the Canadian government's basic attitude. Mr. Green said that approval was being held up by the P.M. He agreed, or appeared to, when I urged that this was distinguishable from other nuclear proposals as it had reference to U.S. weapons and U.S. bases. He thought this might be valid but was obviously worried at the idea of any nuclear devices being located on Canadian soil. (My judgment is that this instinctive repulsion from nuclear involvement of any kind is at the base of Mr. Green's own negative attitude on all defence matters, especially where the U.S., the great nuclear power, is involved).

Apart from our position on specific measures, I said, my anxiety derived from the fact that we continued to support the principle of joint North American defence with the U.S. but there was, or seemed to be, a gap between our professions and our performance. Our frequently-stated public position was that the U.S. nuclear capability (SAC) was the deterrent upon which we, and the rest of the free world, depended. Our contribution to the joint defence was a contribution in the first instance to the protection of that deterrent. It seemed to follow that we should do what was necessary to maintain the efficiency of our element in the joint defence arrangements. Did this not imply doing what was held to be necessary for the effectiveness of these arrangements including, in due course, the arming of Canadian forces with nuclear defensive weapons? And meantime their preparatory equipping and training on this assumption? It seemed to me that the only alternatives to this, our ostensible policy, were either to stand aside altogether in some sort of neutralist role (Minifie) or to confine ourselves to supplementary conventional arms and leave the defence of North America to the U.S.

The Minister would not accept this proposition. He said that there would be total destruction of Canada if we were caught by a nuclear war between the two major antagonists. At the same time, Mr. G. said he was certainly no neutralist nor follower of Minifie (who had very little influence on Canadians). Only recently he had in public speeches in British Columbia repudiated a policy of neutrality for Canada (it would not be in accord with Canadian tradition — v. 1914, 1939; worse "it would be bad for the Canadian character"). He had had good applause for this sentiment. Canadians were not in any danger of espousing a neutralist attitude.

I asked whether it would not be possible "politically" in Canada to launch a spirited public defence of U.S. policies at any rate in terms of the general objectives of policy. Mr. Green thought that such an attitude would be very damaging in the present state of Canadian public opinion. At the same time, he agreed, there had been and was much that was commendable in U.S. policies and behaviour. It was in large measure the relative extent and complexity of the international responsibilities the U.S. had undertaken which differentiated American attitudes from our own.

Should I undertake one or two public speeches on this theme in Canada? Or was the subject too charged politically for a civil servant? At first the Minister thought this might be good but, on second thoughts, felt I should clear any such proposal with the P.M. as he had raised with me the problem of anti-American sentiment.

We parted at 11:10 p.m. or so, agreeing that our conversation (inconclusive as it had been) had been useful. We would be meeting Herter tomorrow and see what developed. He would also take up with [Norman Robertson] the CL-44 proposal.

THE MINISTER'S TALK WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE

September 21

Today the Minister expressed concern as to the Secretary of State's reaction to yesterday's talk. He was afraid that Herter would be "all upset." The P.M. had exaggerated the situation. Could I find out from Merchant how Herter felt?

I spoke to Merchant this evening (see my note to the Minister, September 22). He left me in no doubt that the Secretary of State was genuinely disturbed. I drew his attention to the central importance of Mr. Green's personal reluctance to having Canada participate in nuclear arming. Merchant had seized the significance of this.

September 22

When I reported my conversation with Merchant to the Minister, he expressed the view that Herter was not unduly disquieted. I demurred; we had not heard the last of it, I felt sure.

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE MINISTER OF FINANCE AND THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, SEPTEMBER 26

Last evening I had given the Minister of Finance (who is staying at the Embassy during meetings of the World Bank and Fund) a summary "run-down" of the talks in which I had taken part from August 30th with the Prime Minister, the Minister, Merchant and the Secretary of State. Mr. Fleming had expressed concern at this development and the view that the government had some responsibility for setting public opinion aright. We spoke of the possibility of this matter being raised when he saw Mr. Anderson the following day.

This afternoon, the Minister asked me to accompany him (with Rasminsky and Plumptre) when he called on the Secretary and, toward the end of an hour's conversation, Mr. Fleming himself raised the subject. He said that he understood that there was some concern in Administration circles at evidence of anti-American attitudes in Canada. In his own judgment, these manifestations were superficial "froth and foam" and should not be regarded as affecting seriously the basic soundness of the relationship between the two countries. He asked whether Mr. Anderson was worried on this score.

The Secretary was quite obviously familiar with the recent growth of Canadian criticism of the United States, particularly in its military policy. He said that he thought that this arose in part because of the increased industrialization of Canada and competition between Canadian and U.S. business interests. This phenomenon was not dissimilar from that which had occurred in the United States when the South complained that the North was "robbing" it by taking profits from the acquisition and processing of Southern raw materials; incidentally, the shoe was now on the other foot and "books were being written" to show that the South was now robbing the North in the course of its own industrialization.

The major current concern in relations between the two countries, Mr. Anderson continued, was in the field of defence policy. He was not sure that there was not a pretty wide divergence between strategic and political "concepts" in Ottawa and Washington. Here (in the USA), it was generally thought that, if war were to come, it would be an all-out business which would involve the whole nation and full employment of nuclear weapons; so that the USA felt it necessary to maintain an adequate (nuclear) deterrent.

Many Americans, the Secretary went on, were getting weary of bearing the major part of the defence effort for the free world. If one included interest on the debt of World War II, 82% of the U.S. budget went for military purposes; 52% if one included only military aid in addition to direct U.S. defence costs. In such circumstances, criticism from allies, in particular Canada, tended to rouse resentment and bad feeling.

It was, in Mr. Anderson's judgment, quite essential that senior officials of the two governments maintain the closest, frankest relationship with one another with the object of meeting and dealing with differences before they became enlarged and inflamed and harder to dispose of. In that connection, he gave an instance of a misunderstanding which had arisen when he was negotiating the St. Lawrence Treaty some years ago (as Secretary of Defense) with General McNaughton. By pinning the misunderstanding promptly, it had been dissipated. This was the technique we should always adopt and we could do this if we remained in close contact and high officials of the two governments had mutual confidence.

The Minister said that he hoped that the Secretary would let him know at once if, now at any time, there were anything which he, Mr. Anderson, felt that members of the Canadian Government could do to improve our relationships or avoid or alleviate difficulties. Personally, he attached the greatest possible importance to the maintenance of our traditionally close and friendly association and to the continuance of genuine confidence between the two governments.

Finally, Mr. Fleming said, he wanted the Secretary to know that, in his judgment, the recent public criticisms of the United States and of U.S. policy were in large part the result of ignorance of the facts. Fundamentally, the feelings of Canadians toward Americans remained and would continue in the frame of our traditional friendship.

L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis
au premier ministre

Ambassador in United States
to Prime Minister

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, September 27, 1960

Dear Prime Minister,

From the point of view of our relations with this country, there is no doubt that your speech before the General Assembly yesterday[23] was a great success. Livingston Merchant, who had just returned from New York, called me a few moments ago to say how well it had been received and how "splendid" he had thought it. "It was like a breath of fresh air," he said, in the uncertainty and pessimism which had permeated the Assembly since Khrushchev's vituperative effort on Friday last.

Indeed, quite apart from the helpful consequences within the Alliance and among the "uncommitted" nations, the effect of your going to New York and speaking as and when you did is bound, I believe, to be salutary in the special situation about which you spoke to me in Ottawa just before I returned here. Since our two conversations then, I have naturally been very much worried about what might result from the widespread "anti-American" sentiment in Canada which was causing you serious concern and which you asked me to draw to the attention of senior U.S. officials. In the interval, I have had a long private talk with Merchant who probably knows and understands Canada best among the top people in the Administration. I have had a brief word with the Secretary of State and, as Howard Green may have had an opportunity of telling you in New York, I accompanied him when he saw Herter last week and on that occasion the subject was also discussed.

There is no doubt that the assessment which you asked me to convey to high U.S. authorities of the present state of Canadian opinion has caused them serious concern and some bewilderment. Members of the Administration, including I have no doubt the President himself, feel, with some justification I think you would agree, that, during their term of office, they have made considerable effort to meet Canadian complaints and difficulties. Despite this, they now find themselves widely criticized and learn that anti-American sentiment is causing Canadian authorities serious anxiety. Their immediate reaction is "What can be done about it?"

[23] Voir/See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Statements and Speeches 1959-60, No. 60/32.

In this situation, as I say, your speech at the U.N. has been most helpful here and, I would hope and expect, in Canada as well, particularly following as it did the firm and constructive speech by the President. Howard Green's private talk with Herter was also valuable,[24] I believe, in confirming the really excellent personal relations which exist between principal members of the two governments. Only yesterday, I was with Donald Fleming when he had a long conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury which illustrated once more the extraordinary intimacy and mutual confidence existing between Cabinet members in the two governments. This relationship of "Ministers," like your own personal relationship with the President, is of course not the same as public opinion but it does constitute, it seems to me, a solid base on which to build.

As you said, when we talked in Ottawa, the major current difficulties between the two countries revolve around defence policy and military questions. There is no doubt that, as Mr. Green pointed out to the Secretary of State last week, Americans generally are more conscious of the Soviet threat and consequently of the need to maintain strong defences than are Canadians. There is plenty of evidence of popular opinion on this topic here nowadays as the political leaders on the two sides move into the final stages of the election campaign. Then too, Canada's relationship to the defence of the nuclear deterrent (SAC) and to its effectiveness as the shield of the West is complicated and difficult, not only because of the special horror which surrounds the nuclear weapon but also because of natural Canadian sensitivity to anything which appears to impinge upon our independence, particularly in vital matters of war and peace.

In this last connection, I am hopeful that the offer which the Cabinet authorized me to make last week[25] for the "swap" of Canadian CL-44s (plus Canadian manning of Pinetree stations) for U.S. fighters may, if accepted by the Administration, help to restore and strengthen our defence relations. Another question, the solution of which would, I believe, do much to improve the situation in this area, is approval of the "MB-1" agreement for nuclear storage, provided that a formula can be found which is satisfactory from the Canadian point of view. My impression is that, at the Seigniory Club in July, we were very close to a solution which would meet Canadian reservations.

I hope that during your talk with the President, you were able to touch on this problem of "public" relations between the two countries which is causing you such anxiety. I will be interested to know if this were so. For my own part, I expect that, when the Secretary to State returns from New York, he will want to talk to me privately again. If you have any further suggestions as to what I might say, I would, of course, be very grateful for your guidance.

Yours sincerely,

ARNOLD HEENEY

PRIVATE AND PERSONAL [Washington], September 30, 1960

THOUGHTS ON CANADIAN DEFENCE POLICY

1. It seems to me that there are three directions in which Canadian defence policy might logically develop. These can be defined roughly as follows:

First, a neutralist policy. This would involve renouncing our traditional joint defence arrangements with the United States, leaving NATO and sharply reducing our defence expenditures. Under such a policy, Canadian defence forces could be restricted to "coast guard" operations and patrols, probably sea, land and air, which would have no military significance.

Second, a limited policy, based upon the denial to Canadian forces of nuclear weapons of any kind or training for nuclear weapons with concentration on conventional defences. Such a policy could be accompanied by full and public acceptance (or reaffirmation) of the Canadian reliance on the USA nuclear deterrent and, as a corollary to this, willingness to do everything necessary or desirable to improve not only the defence of the deterrent but also its effectiveness. So, for example, while Canadian forces at the disposition of a joint Canada-United States command, NATO and the U.N. would be strictly conventional, Canada would contribute directly to the efficiency of the nuclear deterrent by the provision of bases, storage, refuelling points and so forth for SAC as well as for NORAD.

Third, continuation of the present policy, as developed since 1940, Ogdensburg. Ostensibly this involves full cooperation with the United States in North American defence, in the protection of the deterrent, facilitation of U.S. strategic nuclear power and the preparation and training of Canadian forces for nuclear armament. In fact, this has tended more and more to mean "integration" of Canadian elements with those of the United States, at any rate in North America. The process has been slow and spasmodic and, though based upon fairly consistent "doctrine," has led to criticism within and outside government circles in Canada.

2. The first policy, with variations and additions, is not far from the C.C.F. or the new party platform as I understand it. The second may have some features in common with the new Liberal position although this is far from clear. The third policy is that which has been followed by Canadian governments, Liberal and Conservative, since before Pearl Harbour. Practice has tended increasingly to diverge from official profession, not only where Canadian "sovereignty" appears to be involved but especially where there is some nuclear element in the mix.

3. An important advantage which might be claimed for a policy along the second line would be that it would tend to withdraw the poison from recent Canada-U.S. defence relationships. It would enable the Canadian Government to be frank and cooperative in its dealings with the United States. It would enormously facilitate the use of Canadian geography for North American defence and it would enable Canadian (conventional) forces to be fitted in precisely with those of the United States while, at the same time, retaining, I think, a larger measure of national identity. In this conception, Canadian forces would be tailored to tasks for the North American Alliance, for NATO and for the U.N. to which they were suited. Another considerable advantage would be the contribution of such a policy by Canada to restricting to the U.S. and the Soviet Union the use of the nuclear weapon. Such a policy would and should not involve any reduction in Canadian defence expenditure.

4. The third "traditional" policy has become greatly confused in the public mind and, I believe, in the minds of those who have to operate within it on both sides of the border as nuclear and other technology has developed. The special public distaste for Canadian involvement in anything to do with the nuclear weapon has been partly responsible for this and the rigidities of U.S. law have added to the difficulty. Consequently it has not been possible for Canadian governments to accept the full implications of agreed principles and the tendency has been to delay and even refuse proposals involving Canadian action even though such actions are clearly implicit in professed policies and recommended by the military advisers of both nations. If the traditional policy is to be continued, there would be advantage in having it restated fully and frankly and it seems to me the Government could minimize rather than add to their difficulties at home by a reaffirmation of closest military partnership and a frank admission of what that involved in terms of integration and joint command.

5. There are obvious difficulties in any one of these three courses, both practical and political, domestic, bilateral and multilateral. Nevertheless, I am inclined to the opinion that, unless an attempt is made soon to develop a coherent line, the situation at home and in our relations with the United States is likely to become worse rather than better. The first step would be a serious and certainly "agonizing" reappraisal in Ottawa on a political and military level. It would also be necessary to have very private conversations with U.S. authorities before anything final were decided. Such an undertaking, even if it did not result in dotting the I's and crossing the T's, is, I am sure, long overdue. Finally, although I have sketched in very roughly three distinguishable courses, it is obvious that there is also a good deal of unexplored territory between each and that combinations and shifts of emphasis would be possible.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, November 1, 1960

Dear Norman [Robertson],

You will remember that, during my conversations with the Prime Minister at the end of August, when he mentioned the likelihood of economic measures having to be taken which would affect Canada-United States relations in the economic area, I emphasized the importance of our being given the opportunity of informing the U.S. Administration in advance. Mr. Diefenbaker certainly gave me the impression that he agreed that this should, and would, be done.

We have, of course, been aware from newspaper speculation and other sources that a good deal has been cooking in this realm over the past couple of months. Barrow of Trade and Commerce has been down here for the last couple of days in connection with U.S. arrangements for assistance to "Small Business" and he has given us privately a more specific description of the kinds of things that are under study.

Now that Parliament is to meet on November 17th, I presume that the Government will be under increasingly heavy pressure to reveal their economic programme and I presume that it will include a number of measures in which the United States will have an interest. If this be so, I do very much hope that arrangements will be made for me to be instructed to let the appropriate U.S. authorities know what is intended before they read it in the newspapers. I realize that this may cause some practical difficulty in Ottawa. Nevertheless, it is of great importance in terms of our general relationship in the economic and commercial field that we should at least let them know what we are intending to do and why.

You may regard this as less an appeal for "consultation" (although I think that in some instances we might go that far) than for the opportunity to give notice of intention.

Bob Bryce has promised to do his best to see that we are warned but I thought I should drop you this personal line to emphasize the importance I attach to "early warning."

Yours ever,

ARNOLD [HEENEY]

CONFIDENTIAL [Washington], November 25, 1960

Today I saw Livingston Merchant, Under-Secretary of State for Political Affairs, on Canada-U.S. relations in general.

2. Among the topics which we covered in our talk were recent developments in the economic situations and policies of both countries. I took the opportunity of drawing to Merchant's attention in this connection certain features of the Speech from the Throne and to the prospect of legislation in Parliament which would affect the United States in one way or another. No doubt the State Department was being kept well informed currently by the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa in this area. For the moment, I could do no more than refer to those passages from the Throne Speech which touched upon prospective measures. I hoped, as the Government programme developed, to be able to inform U.S. authorities more fully and specifically before legislation were enacted.

3. With respect to the recent presidential directives arising out of the U.S. imbalance of payments,[26] I said that I hoped to see the Under-Secretary of State upon his return from Europe and discuss the relationship of these measures to the bilateral Canada-U.S. position. Meantime, I wanted to draw to the State Department's attention the distinction between the position of Canada and that of other countries, notably Germany. As he knew, Canada itself was in serious imbalance with the United States on current account and, if the presidential directive were to be implemented fully in respect of Canada, this situation would be worsened. I hoped, therefore, that the United States would, in the application of these measures, adapt their incidence to the Canadian situation.

4. Merchant asked (though not wholly seriously) how we would react to an embargo upon U.S. capital movements into Canada. They would be of an order, he thought, to correct perhaps the total outflow of U.S. gold. I responded by saying that, if the U.S. were mad enough to undertake any such measure, our reaction would not be hard to forecast.

5. All of this preliminary to my conversation with Dillon and to whatever representations, if any, we get authority from Ottawa to put forward.

Note de l'adjoint spécial au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 9, 1960

RESULT OF U.S. ELECTIONS

This morning the Prime Minister gave me a letter from a J. Louis Lamontagne of Montreal who is apparently a public relations man connected in some way with the Democratic National Committee in Washington. Lamontagne suggested that the Prime Minister should invite Mr. Kennedy to Canada on a personal visit before his inauguration. The Prime Minister asked me to let him have a reaction to this letter.

I discussed it with Mr. Robertson and Mr. Ritchie and then saw the Prime Minister again at lunch time. I said that there were various reasons which seemed to argue for a delay in responding to this idea. In particular, it was possible that President Eisenhower might invite Mr. Kennedy to accompany him to the NATO meeting in Paris in December at which time, if the Prime Minister was there, a meeting would be easily arranged. There was the additional point that the Prime Minister would not wish to lay too much stress on meeting Mr. Kennedy at a time when President Eisenhower was still in office. The Prime Minister appeared to agree with these reasons for delay and signified that he had no intention of acting quickly.

I said however, on the basis of Mr. Robertson's view, that if there was any possibility in the Prime Minister's mind of inviting Kennedy to come to Canada, there would be much to be said for sending him now a message of personal greeting on the outcome of the election. I showed the Prime Minister a draft which had been prepared in the Department. At first the Prime Minister stuck to his previous decision against sending such a message but after some discussion he asked me to attempt a redraft and at the end of the conversation seemed inclined to send a personal message.

The Prime Minister made a few comments which are perhaps worth recording. He said that with Kennedy in control, he thought we were closer to war than we had been before. When I expressed surprise at this statement and suggested that the narrowness of Kennedy's margin would cause him to move with greater caution and responsibility than might have been the case had there been a landslide, the Prime Minister disagreed. He pictured Kennedy as "courageously rash" and said that he had pushed himself to the top against all odds, had spoken of bringing world leadership back to Washington, and had given every indication of intending to pursue an active policy which the Prime Minister feared might prove dangerous.

When I said that much would presumably depend on the people Kennedy had around him, the Prime Minister said that he doubted whether Kennedy would be deterred from adopting a policy of action. I raised the question of who would be Secretary of State and the Prime Minister agreed that this would be an important indicator of Kennedy's intentions. He admitted that if it were Bowles, this would not point to a policy of concentration on military strength.

In domestic matters, the Prime Minister said, without elaborating at all, that although he like Mr. Macmillan was a left-wing conservative, further to the left than many right-wing liberals, there were many things in Kennedy's platform that he could not have accepted. The Prime Minister made some references in this context to the tendency toward government intervention which he thought would be much more pronounced under Kennedy.

On the CL-44,[27] the Prime Minister wondered whether Nixon, having been let down in the election by California, might now be less inclined to use his influence on behalf of the aircraft industry in California. This might result in the administration agreeing to the CL-44 deal; at least it was worth looking into he seemed to think.

STORAGE OF DEFENSIVE NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

We met yesterday with Willoughby and other State Department and Defence Department officials and were handed a redraft of the draft note which we presented in accordance with the instructions in your telegram DL-810 October 2, 1959. The text of this redraft is set out below. The suggested deletions from our draft are bracketed and the suggested additions underlined. You will notice also that reasons are set out for the suggested changes. We are following up this telegram with a further message outlining our detailed discussion with USA officials in which we attempted to elucidate to bring the two drafts closer together, and we shall also report on these. Text Begins:

[27] Voir partie 4 (c) de ce chapitre./See Part 4 (c) of this chapter.
[28] Voir/See Volume 26, document 182.

I have the honour to refer to discussions between representatives of the Canadian and USA governments concerning the strengthening of the continental air defenses by a gradual increase in the numbers of air defence weapons with nuclear capability. These discussions have taken into account recommendations by CINCNORAD as to the immediate military requirement for the storage at certain points in Canada of nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons.

Recognizing the need to strengthen the continental air defences against the threat which exists, and realizing that the full potential of air-to-air defensive weapons is achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads, the Canadian government is prepared to permit the storage of nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons in Canada in accordance with the conditions set out in the attached Annex.

I have the honour to propose that if these conditions are acceptable to your government, this note and your reply shall constitute an agreement between our two governments, to take effect on the date of your reply.

Annex

1. The weapons under consideration are such [defensive] nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons as may from time to time be made available to [the] USA forces under the [command] operational control of CINCNORAD.

Reason: The words "USA" are added for the sake of clarity. The term "operational control" appears to reflect NORAD's terms of reference more accurately than the word "command."

2. These weapons [will] may be stored at Goose Bay and Harmon AFB, Nfld. The cost of the establishment, maintenance and operation of the storage facilities shall be the responsibility of the USA government.

Reason: The word "may" provides the flexibility which USA considers desirable. In this connection the USAF has decided to withdraw the squadron now stationed at Harmon AFB, and in the light of this decision, CINCNORAD is considering whether nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons should be stored at Harmon for emergency purposes.

3. [Arrangements for the physical security for the storage sites will be the joint responsibility of the governments of the two countries. Safeguards in the design and handling of these air defence weapons to minimize the possibility of accidental explosion and to afford the maximum protection of lives and property will be the responsibility of USA government and will be subject to the approval of the Canadian government].

The joint responsibility of the two governments for the physical security of the storage sites shall be exercised in accordance with the following:

(a) USA shall provide and be responsible for the internal security of the storage sites;

(b) In other respects, arrangements for the physical security of the leased areas within which the storage sites are located shall be subject to existing agreements concerning those areas. Safety standards for the maintenance, transportation, loading, delivery and salvage of these weapons shall be at least equivalent to those observed within USA and, within the scope of existing agreements between the two governments concerning the transfer of classified (atomic) information, shall be a matter for consultation between the appropriate military authorities of USA and Canada.

Reason: USA has noted the importance which the Canadian government attaches to the matter of joint responsibility for the physical security of the storage sites and wishes to accede to this request within the limits prescribed by USA legislation and existing arrangements for these bases. USA, however, would like to know what kind of arrangements the Canadian government wishes to propose in this regard. Under USA legislation, USA is required to retain physical custody of nuclear weapons, and thus USA draft reflects USA requirement to be responsible for the internal security of the sites. It is believed that the other aspects of physical security may be handled according to the terms of the existing agreements for the two bases, but USA would be pleased to consider alternative Canadian proposals to handle this specific problem.

On the matter of safety standards, USA has proposed language which the Department of Defense has informally submitted to Canadian military authorities for the Canadian draft note concerning the storage of atomic weapons in support of Canadian forces. The Canadian language above suggests that safeguards in the design of the atomic weapons will be subject to the approval of the Canadian government. This procedure apparently would entail the transmission of restricted data, a course of action not repeat not authorized under the terms of USA Atomic Energy Act.

4. Ownership and custody of the nuclear warheads shall remain with USA government in accordance with USA law.

Reason: By the addition of the words "and custody" the paragraph reflects more accurately the requirements of USA legislation.

5. [Transportation to or from storage facilities of these weapons and warheads through Canadian air space will be governed by Canadian government regulations. Import and export of these weapons will be subject to Canadian government regulations, and detailed procedures will be negotiated between the appropriate government departments.]

Reason: In the absence of knowing what the Canadian regulations would be governing the transport of nuclear weapons in Canada, USA would prefer the wording of paragraph 5 to reflect that this is a matter to be worked out jointly. The following language could be used. "The transport of these weapons in Canadian territory will be carried out in accordance with procedures agreed between the appropriate agencies of both governments."

6. [Joint responsibility for the removal from storage sites and for the use of these weapons will be shared by the Canadian and USA governments. They] consonant with the joint responsibility of the two governments, these weapons will be used only in situations of grave emergency [and] in accordance with the plans and procedures governing the operations of the North American Air Defense Command as approved by the two governments.

Reason: The first sentence of the Canadian draft poses 2 problems:

(1) It suggests that over and above clearance procedures already in effect with regard to nuclear overflights of Canadian territory and procedures which might be worked out with regard to the movement of nuclear weapons in and out of Canada under paragraph 5 of this annex, special authorization of the Canadian government would be required to remove nuclear weapons from storage, say, for return to USA for periodic checking or other logistical reasons.

(2) It suggests that the agreement of Canada would be required at a time when CINCNORAD would wish to use the weapons in accordance with plans and procedures agreed between the two governments. In USA view this mode of operation could seriously impair the ability of CINCNORAD to act rapidly in situations of grave emergency where action must be taken within minutes.

Accordingly USA proposed language omits any reference to "removal from storage" and ties in the "joint responsibility" of the two governments with use of the weapons "only in situations of grave emergency in accordance with plans and procedures governing the operations of the North American Air Defense Command as approved by both governments."

7. Any test firing of these weapons which may be required will take place outside of Canada.

8. The terms of this agreement will be reviewed [annually] by the two governments at the request of either government and after such review may be terminated by either government upon six months notice.

Reason: The purpose of USA revision is to remove the need to review the agreement automatically at the end of each year, while preserving the requirements that such a review is mandatory at the request of either government.

9. Supplementary arrangements or administrative agreements between authorized agencies of the two governments may be made from time to time for the purpose of carrying out the intent of this agreement. Text Ends.

STORAGE OF DEFENSIVE NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

The following is an outline of our discussion with USA officials concerning their suggested redraft of our note on this subject.

2. In considering paragraph 3 of USA draft, it became immediately evident that the definition of "storage sites" requires clarification. USA Department of Defense defines storage site as the "igloo plus the compound" rather than the base. They wondered what we had in mind in suggesting joint responsibility for the security of the site. If, for instance, we had in mind that Canada might provide for "external security" would this mean security measures immediately outside the compound or outside the base? If the former, they were concerned that this would seem to involve revision of existing agreements at least in respect of Harmon. In any event you will see that it is their desire that security arrangements — other than within the site for which USA would be responsible — should be subject to "existing agreements" but that they are quite prepared to consider any proposals we might wish to make.

3. It was thought that the provision regarding "safeguards" or "safety standards" as paragraph 3 of the redraft describes them might be the subject of a separate paragraph. The language proposed is generally the same as that proposed for the general agreement which you have currently under consideration. Not repeat not knowing your views on this paragraph we restricted our comments to the question of the responsibility of USA government and the question of the approval of safeguards by the Canadian government. We expressed the view that provision for "consultation between the appropriate military authorities of USA and Canada" would hardly meet your requirement, bearing in mind the responsibility which would also rest on the Canadian government, vis-à-vis the Canadian people. We wondered whether USA could accept a phrase replacing that already quoted which would provide, "and shall be subject to the approval of the Canadian government," assuming the remainder of their redraft were acceptable to you.

4. Regarding paragraph 4 and the specific reference to "custody," the State Department confirmed that while the word "custody" does not repeat not appear in USA Act,[29] this interpretation flows from sections 91, 92, 104, 123 and 144 in the legislative history of the act. This expression is used in other bilateral agreements. It in turn is interpreted to mean, "physical control until released for use."

5. If the Canadian version of paragraph 5 relates only to the XYZ procedures of schedule B of Order-in-Council PC-2307[30] it would be acceptable. USA concern regarding the first sentence was that it might involve procedures other than the XYZ procedures and that reference to "export and import" in the second sentence might involve customs inspection. The word, "introduction" was suggested as one which would avoid the inference regarding customs inspection if it were not repeat not valid.

6. Commenting on more general terminology suggested by USA we thought something along the following lines would be more in keeping with our own proposal: "The transport of these weapons between USA and Canada and in or over Canadian territory will be carried out in accordance with appropriate regulations of the Canadian government, and procedures agreed between the responsible agencies of both governments."

7. In your telegram DL-810 October 2[31] you indicated that movement of the weapons would be subject to the Canadian Atomic Energy Act and that USA officials would be familiar with these regulations as a result of their experience with overflight procedures. Unless the Order-in-Council incorporates the relevant provisions of the Atomic Energy Act there was some doubt both on USA officials and our own part as to what these regulations might require.

8. It transpired during the discussion that USA has in mind transporting the weapons to and from Canada only by air. The defence representative did not repeat not think there would be any occasion for transporting weapons between Goose Bay and Harmon although he admitted this point had not repeat not been considered. Again on this point, as with security and safeguards, we emphasized the need to specify the basic Canadian responsibility.

9. In paragraph 6 USA difficulty with our proposal for joint control over removal stems from their interpretation that this would mean joint control over removal from the igloo and compound for such purposes as placing them on aircraft which is the normal procedure during practice alerts where aircraft are bombed-up, taxi down the runway but do not repeat not take off. Furthermore if storage sites were interpreted to mean the whole base USA officials consider our language would suggest the interposition of consultative requirements over and above those already required under the XYZ procedures. As a result of our discussion, the State Department passed to us this morning a further revision of the paragraph which has been drafted by the Defence Department: "Consonant with the joint responsibility of the two governments, these weapons will be removed from the areas utilized by USA forces in accordance with applicable procedures approved by the two governments and will be used only in situations of grave emergency in accordance with the plans and procedures governing the operation of the North American Air Defence Command as approved by the two governments." The latter proviso is intended to refer to the XYZ procedures.

This refers to the United States Atomic Energy Act.

[30] Voir/See document 278.

[31] Voir/See Volume 26, document 182.

10. During our discussion yesterday we suggested the following text which might be more acceptable from our point of view: "Joint responsibility for the removal of these weapons from the leased areas within which they are stored and for their use will be shared by the Canadian and USA governments. This joint responsibility will be exercised in accordance with existing overflight procedures as approved by the Canadian government and also in accordance with plans and procedures governing the operations of the North American Air Defence Command as approved by the two governments which provide for the use of these weapons only in situations of grave emergency."

11. You will no repeat no doubt have in mind the importance of ensuring that the agreement on Goose and Harmon is consistent with the general agreement. In this connection you will also want to bear in mind a possible further agreement regarding storage at Argentia and particularly in connection with any provision regarding removal from the storage site. Our recollection is that this point was raised at the Camp David talks in connection with the removal of weapons from the site and placing them on board ships.

Private Memorandum from Secretary to Cabinet to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], January 28, 1960

SPEAK TO THE PRIME MINISTER RE SAC AT GOOSE

1. I believe it most important for mutual defence to improve deterrent to extent possible by having major nuclear weapons at Goose Bay for SAC.

2. My own impression — we can do this now without serious domestic or international difficulty — following early Parliamentary discussion on nuclear weapons generally.

3. Mr. Green is the only serious opponent and his case is neither clear nor strong in my view. Mr. Pearkes is strong for it but unwilling to press at Cabinet against Mr. Green's vehement opposition.

4. The re-fuelling bases which the Government agreed to and permitted the U.S. to spend millions on are a much more vital and dangerous aid to SAC and involve the difficult problem of last minute movement of tankers.

5. Officials in External Affairs have no valid arguments against this and military consider it vitally important in our interest as well as the U.S.

6. Nothing to be gained by delay on this measure — advantage lies with prompt action now that Canadian public accepting general principle.

7. This is not a proper subject for horse-trading — should be done in recognition of general interest not as favour to the U.S. — doing it will gain us more in U.S. confidence in our seriousness than if we try to swap it reluctantly.

8. Not necessary to take initiative to announce but should let it come out in answer to question or in debate — should not refer to specific location but say something to the effect that the Government has recently agreed to the storage of major weapons at certain locations in northern Canada subject to suitable safeguards and Canadian consent for use, and in pursuance to the agreement given by the previous government to construction of facilities for this purpose.

9. The Prime Minister should see the U.S. Ambassador and inform him in a way to get maximum effect, emphasizing that we now feel that it is politically feasible, we recognize its importance but feel we must have agreement on certain major features — e.g. joint security arrangements and Canadian consent by application of overflight arrangements and arrangements for consultation.

10. In informing U.S., we should use this occasion to emphasize that we hope for and expect a relaxation of tensions with the U.S.S.R., we shall work toward this end though not by reducing our defences except as agreed disarmament measures or when they become ineffective. In working for reduction of tensions, we will occasionally differ both privately and publicly with the U.S. on what should be said and done but on the whole we think it is a good thing for both countries and the general interest that we should differ publicly from time to time, for there are things that Canada can do if it is manifestly independent and relying on its own judgment of its own interest and the general interest.[32]

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], February 18, 1960

STORAGE OF AIR-TO-AIR DEFENSIVE NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON AIR FORCE BASE

Attached† for your consideration is a draft memorandum to Cabinet reflecting the views you expressed to me recently concerning the storage of air-to-air defensive nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base. The memorandum has been considered by the Department of National Defence, and General Foulkes informs me that Mr. Pearkes is prepared to agree to the text, subject to clarification of the following points when the memorandum is discussed by Cabinet:

(a) Custody: The Department of National Defence questions our omission of the word "custody" and quotes the reference to it by the Prime Minister in his statement of February 20, 1959.[33]

External Affairs Comment: The acceptability or otherwise of the word "custody" is, of course, a matter to be decided by the Government.

(b) Stationing of Canadian Representatives at Each Base: National Defence suggests that consideration be given to dropping this requirement for the following reasons:

(i) The agreement of June 30, 1959[34] regarding overflight of Canada and use of Canadian bases by United States interceptors under certain conditions assures adequate control at Goose Bay and, therefore, the statement of intention to have an observer there "might be misconstrued as impinging on the integrity of the United States authorities."

[34] Voir/See Volume 26, document 196.

(ii) As far as Harmon is concerned, "it is understood that the United States authorities may drop this requirement."

External Affairs Comment: The necessity or otherwise of having Canadian representatives at the base is essentially a political question and is for the Government to decide. So far as Harmon is concerned, the position is that the United States has not yet dropped its requirement to store these weapons there and has indicated that it may wish to have the weapons available for use in emergency, even if the fighter squadron now stationed there is withdrawn.

(c) Safeguards in the Design of Weapons and Safety Procedures: National Defence questions our requirement that "The procedure for handling the weapons to afford the maximum protection of lives and property will be subject to the agreement of Canada," on the grounds that it would seem to contemplate a formal inter-governmental agreement on this particular matter, which in the circumstances is unnecessary since the RCAF has already been briefed on handling procedures for the MB-1. National Defence suggests that the United States be informed that what is meant by the words "agreement of Canada" is that procedures similar to those used with the MB-1 (on which the RCAF has already been briefed) would be followed if any new weapon is subsequently adopted. In other words, the USAF would brief the RCAF on safety precautions and the RCAF would satisfy the Canadian Government that the new weapon satisfies our safety requirements.

External Affairs Comment: I do not agree with the view expressed by National Defence that in respect of safety procedures the words "agreement of Canada" imply a formal inter-governmental agreement. We certainly had envisaged nothing more than an exchange of correspondence between the two Defence Departments, signifying the agreement of Canada, after the RCAF had satisfied the Canadian Government that the new weapon complied with our safety requirements.

(d) Transport of the Weapons will be in Accordance with Canadian Law: National Defence argues that as transport arrangements are already covered by the present overflight arrangements and as the Atomic Energy Control Board has not so far promulgated any safety regulations under the Atomic Energy Control Act, the use of the words "in accordance with Canadian law" would not seem to be correct, and should be deleted.

External Affairs Comment: I do not agree with National Defence that it is inappropriate to refer to Canadian law in regard to transport arrangements. The overflight procedures themselves have been established under Canadian law; moreover, the Atomic Energy Control Board has regulations governing the import and export of nuclear materials (which National Defence has complied with in respect of United States weapons entering Canada) and could at any time adopt additional ones. We consulted with the Secretary of the Control Board and he agreed with us that the inclusion of the reference to Canadian law is desirable.

If the draft memorandum for Cabinet meets with your approval I will arrange to have it circulated as a Cabinet document for consideration at an early meeting.

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 67-60 [Ottawa], March 2, 1960

STORAGE OF AIR-TO-AIR DEFENSIVE NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON AIR FORCE BASE

Cabinet, on September 22, 1959, gave its approval in principle, subject to the conclusion of satisfactory inter-governmental Notes, to the storage at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base of nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons for United States Air Force squadrons under NORAD control. The text of a negotiating draft of a proposed Note authorizing the storage of the weapons, and an accompanying Annex setting out the terms which would govern the arrangement, was subsequently transmitted (on October 2, 1959) to the United States authorities for their consideration. The State Department replied on January 15, 1960, making no comment on the Note itself but proposing a number of changes in the text of the Annex.

Attached as Appendix "A" to this memorandum, for consideration by Cabinet, is a redraft of the terms originally proposed by Canada. If approved, this redraft, which has been prepared in the light of United States comments, would be transmitted by our Embassy in Washington to the State Department and would serve as the basis for the second round of negotiations. Also attached, for convenient reference, as Appendix "B"[35] to this memorandum is a copy of our original draft modified to indicate the changes proposed by the United States, together with the reasons advanced in support of these changes.

The comments which follow relate to Appendix "A" and are intended to explain the reasons for any departures from the language contained in the text proposed by Canada last October.

Paragraph 1: This paragraph has been amended to incorporate useful changes suggested by the United States.

Paragraph 2: This paragraph has been amended in two respects:

(a) At the suggestion of the United States, the statement that the weapons will be stored at Goose Bay and Harmon has been changed to read may;

(b) The statement of ownership of the weapons by the United States has been incorporated in this paragraph rather than having it form the substance of a separate paragraph as was the case in the original Canadian draft.

The United States proposal to amend the statement of ownership to read "ownership and custody" has not been adopted since it is assumed that this would not be acceptable to the Canadian Government. It is recognized that the omission of any statement which makes it clear that the United States will retain possession of the weapons may be difficult for the United States Government to accept. However, a change which has been introduced in paragraph 3 of the text now under consideration (see below) should give our representative in the negotiations grounds for arguing that reference to custody is unnecessary.

Paragraph 3: This paragraph represents a complete departure from the Canadian draft of last October, which asserted the principle that arrangements for the physical security of the storage sites would be the joint responsibility of the two Governments without indicating how Canada could fulfil its share of this responsibility. The proposed new text begins with the statement that arrangements for the storage of the weapons are a joint responsibility of the two Governments, and then describes how this responsibility is to be carried out. The part of the text which defines the Canadian responsibility is based on the premise that the objective, so far as the Canadian Government is concerned, is to ensure that the provisions of the agreement regarding the circumstances under which the weapons may be removed from the base installation, and concerning safety standards, are observed. For these reasons it is specified that Canada will station a representative or representatives at the bases. The presence of Canadians will also serve to demonstrate the importance attached by the Canadian Government to strict adherence to the terms of the agreement.

The statement that the United States, for its part, shall provide and be responsible for the security of the storage sites in accordance with the terms of the existing agreements concerning the leased areas is intended to specify, in this respect, its obligations as lessee. At the same time, it provides grounds for our representatives in the negotiations to put forward the view that under the circumstances the question of custody does not arise.

Paragraph 4: The substances of this paragraph, which deals with safety standards, was included in paragraph 3 of the original Canadian draft. It has been made the subject of a separate paragraph at the suggestion of the United States and redrafted to improve the expression of its intent.

Paragraph 5: In order to improve the drafting of the provisions in the agreement relating to transport of the weapons in Canada and, at the same time, to take account of a point raised by the United States, this paragraph has been amended to read as follows:

> "The transport of these weapons in Canadian territory will be carried out in accordance with Canadian law and with procedures agreed between the appropriate agencies of both Governments."

The procedures referred to above would involve two elements:

(a) authorization by the Canadian Government of the overflight of Canadian territory in accordance with the provisions of Schedule "B" to Order-in-Council No. P.C. 2307 of 17 April, 1952; and

(b) any safety procedures applied by the Canadian authorities in accordance with the requirements of the Atomic Energy Control Board and of the safety standards referred to in paragraph 4 of the Agreement.

Paragraphs 6 and 7: These paragraphs should be considered in conjunction with paragraph 5. Paragraphs 5 and 6 set out the procedures which would govern transport of the weapons outside the base, either for logistic or for operational reasons, and paragraph 7 provides that removal of the weapons, either for logistic or operational reasons, will require approval of the Canadian Government in accordance with procedures established pursuant to paragraphs 5 and 6.

There are two points to note in connection with these paragraphs. The first is that paragraph 7 extends the area within which the USAF is permitted to handle the weapons from the "storage site" to "the area utilized by the United States forces" (i.e. the base). The State Department informs us that this extension is necessary to meet training requirements, i.e. practice in arming aircraft and taxiing down the runway but not taking off. Such a concession would seem to be reasonable since a Canadian representative would be present to ensure that the terms of the authorization were not exceeded.

The second point arises out of a United States argument that the requirement of Canadian approval for removal of the weapons for operational use could seriously impair the ability of NORAD to act rapidly in an emergency. It is proposed that our Embassy in Washington should be instructed to inform the State Department that the Canadian Government regards this measure of control as being substantially equivalent to that exercised by the President of the United States and considers it essential for political and policy reasons which are no doubt similar to those of the United States Government.

Paragraph 8: This paragraph has been amended to correspond with the policy with respect to review and termination of agreements in this field expressed by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on January 18, 1960.[36]

With the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, I am submitting this draft for consideration by Cabinet in preparation for the next stage of the negotiations with the United States.

REDRAFT OF THE ANNEX TO THE PROPOSED EXCHANGE OF NOTES CONCERNING THE STORAGE OF NUCLEAR AIR-TO-AIR DEFENSIVE WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON AIR FORCE BASE

(In this Annex, unless the context otherwise requires, "Canada" means the Government of Canada, "United States" means the Government of the United States of America, "NORAD" means the North American Air Defence Command established by Canada and the United States in an Exchange of Notes dated 12 May, 1958, and "CINC NORAD" means the Commander-in-Chief of NORAD.)

The weapons under consideration are such nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons as may from time to time be made available to United States Forces under the operational control of CINC NORAD.

2. Ownership of these weapons shall remain with the United States in accordance with United States law. They may be stored at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base, Newfoundland. The cost of the establishment, maintenance and operation of the storage facilities shall be the responsibility of the United States Government.

3. Arrangements for the storage of these weapons will be a joint responsibility of Canada and the United States, to be carried out as follows:

(a) The United States shall provide and be responsible for the security of the storage sites in accordance with the terms of the existing agreements concerning the leased areas, i.e. the Agreement of March 27, 1941 concerning Leased Bases in Newfoundland in respect of Harmon Air Force Base and the Exchange of Notes of December 5, 1952 in respect of the leased area situated within RCAF Station, Goose Bay;

(b) Pursuant to its obligations under paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 7 of this Annex, Canada will provide a representative or representatives at each base.

For the official text of Prime Minister Diefenbaker's statement, see Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1960, Volume I, p. 73.

4. Safeguards in the design of the weapons will be the responsibility of the United States. The procedure for handling the weapons to afford the maximum protection of lives and property will be subject to the agreement of Canada. Safety procedures for maintenance, transport, loading, storage and salvage will be at least equivalent to United States standards.

5. The transport of these weapons in Canadian territory will be carried out in accordance with Canadian law and with procedures agreed between the appropriate agencies of both Governments.

6. Approval of the use of these weapons will be a joint responsibility of the two Governments. The weapons will only be used in situations of grave emergency in accordance with the plans and procedures governing the operations of NORAD.

7. The removal of these weapons, either for logistic or operational reasons, from the areas utilized by United States Forces (as provided in the Agreement of March 27, 1941, concerning Leased Bases in Newfoundland in respect of Harmon Air Force Base, and the Exchange of Notes dated December 5, 1952 in respect of the leased area situated within RCAF Station, Goose Bay), will require the approval of the Canadian Government in accordance with the procedures established pursuant to paragraphs 5 and 6 of this Annex.

8. Any test firing of these weapons which may be required will take place outside of Canada.

9. The terms of this Agreement will be reviewed by the two Governments at the request of either Government and after such review may be terminated by either Government upon six months' notice.

10. Supplementary arrangements or administrative agreements between authorized agencies of the two Governments may be made from time to time for the purpose of carrying out the intent of this Agreement.

STORAGE OF AIR-TO-AIR DEFENSIVE NUCLEAR WEAPONS
AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON AIR FORCE BASE
(Previous reference November 10, 1959)

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, in January, the United States had replied to the Canadian draft of a proposed Exchange of Notes on the storage of nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons for United States Air Force squadrons at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force base. Several changes had been suggested, some of which were useful and others which simply could not be accepted in view of the government's attitude on storage and control of these weapons in Canada. Accordingly, a re-draft had been prepared as the basis for the second round of negotiations with the U.S. This he now submitted with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, March 2, Cab. Doc. 67-60).

10. Mr. Green went on to say that the U.S. authorities wanted it stated that ownership and custody would remain with the U.S. The inclusion of the words "and custody" seemed impossible to him in view of the Cabinet's position on this matter in recent months. He commented that the Department of National Defence had objected to a number of points in the proposed Canadian re-draft.

11. The Minister of National Defence emphasized firmly that he had concurred in the re-draft. All he and his officials had done was to express some doubts as to whether the re-draft in its present form would be acceptable to the U.S., and to draw attention to some of the problems to which it would give rise. He noted that the Prime Minister had stated, in an announcement on February 20th, 1959, concerning equipment for the Canadian forces, that the government considered "that it is expedient that ownership and custody of the nuclear warheads should remain with the United States."

12. During the discussion it was said that the government could not change the policy agreed upon when the first note on this subject was approved and sent to the U.S. If the present version was not in any way a diminution of that position it could be accepted. Since the text had been approved by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence, there was no point in having the matter referred to the Cabinet Defence Committee. It could now be transmitted to the U.S. authorities.

13. The Cabinet approved a revised draft of a proposed note for negotiations with the United States concerning the storage of nuclear air-to-air defense weapons for use by United States forces at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force base, as recommended by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence with Cabinet Document 67-60 of March 2.

STORAGE OF AIR-TO-AIR NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

The Cabinet has considered the comments which the United States authorities made on the Canadian draft of the inter-governmental Exchange of Notes on the above subject and the U.S. re-draft. As the United States authorities had no comment or suggestions to make on the text of the covering note and we have no further changes to put forward at this time, we are repeating to you in our immediately following telegram† only the text of the re-draft of the Annex as approved by the Cabinet.

2. When handing the re-draft of the Annex to the State Department you may wish to make use of the following comments. We leave it to you to decide whether it would be useful to give the State Department a "piece of paper" incorporating suitable portions of these comments in order to make certain that there is no misunderstanding as to the reasons for which ministers have approved the language suggested for this second round of negotiations.

3. The following are paragraph-by-paragraph explanatory comments:

(a) Paragraph 1:

This paragraph has been amended to incorporate the useful changes suggested by the United States authorities.

(b) Paragraph 2:

We agree with the United States suggestion that, as the USAF has decided to withdraw the Squadron now stationed at Harmon, "will" should be changed to read 'may." It will also be noted that the statement of ownership of the weapons by the United States has been incorporated in this paragraph rather than have it form the substance of a separate paragraph as was the case in the original Canadian draft. The United States proposal that this statement of ownership should read "ownership and custody" has not been adopted; the change which has been introduced in paragraph 3 will provide you with grounds for arguing that reference to custody is unnecessary.

(c) Paragraph 3:

This paragraph represents a complete departure from the Canadian draft of last October which asserted the principle that arrangements for the physical security of the storage sites would be the joint responsibility of the two governments without indicating how Canada would fulfil its share of this responsibility. The new text states that the arrangements for the storage of these weapons will be a joint responsibility and then describes how this responsibility is to be carried out. The Canadian share of the responsibility is based on the premise that the objective, so far as the Canadian government is concerned, is to ensure that the provisions of the agreement regarding the circumstances under which the weapons may be removed from the base installation, and concerning safety standards, are observed. The presence of a Canadian representative or representatives will also serve to demonstrate the importance which the government attaches to the strict adherence to the terms of the agreement. The statement that the United States for its part shall provide and be responsible for the security of the storage sites in accordance with the terms of existing arrangements concerning the leased areas is intended to specify its obligations as lessee in this matter. At the same time it will provide you with grounds for arguing that under the circumstances the question of custody does not arise.

The State Department may point out that at Goose Bay no aircraft can land or take off without Canadian clearance and also that under the terms of the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1959 (the "MB-1" agreement),[37] USAF interceptors armed with nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons can only overfly Canada and land and take off from Canadian military airfields under certain agreed conditions. In relation to Harmon the State Department may point out that the withdrawal of the United States interceptor squadron would make the presence of a Canadian representative unnecessary. Whether or not the State Department should raise these points you should say that the proposal for Canadian representative at Goose and Harmon is one to which the government attaches importance and reflects its strongly held view as expressed on previous occasions that questions concerning nuclear weapons are matters of high policy.

(d) Paragraph 4:

The substance of this paragraph was included in paragraph 3 of the original Canadian draft. We have, however, agreed to make it the subject of a separate paragraph as suggested by the United States authorities but re-drafted it to improve the expression of its intent, using for the most part, the language suggested by the United States authorities. If you are asked what is meant by the phrase "agreement of Canada" in this paragraph you may say that we envisage an exchange of correspondence between the two defence headquarters signifying the agreement of Canada after the RCAF has satisfied the Canadian government that the weapons to be stored meet Canadian safety requirements.

(e) Paragraph 5:

The wording of this paragraph has been altered with a view to both improving the drafting of the provisions in the agreement relating to transport of the weapons in Canada and to take account of the point raised by the United States authorities. You will note that we have added the words "with Canadian law and" to the language suggested by the United States rather than merely state that the transport of these weapons will be in accordance with agreed procedures. There are two elements involved here:

(1) Authorization by the Canadian government for the transport of nuclear weapons in Canadian territory in accordance with established practice (the procedure would be the same as prescribed in Schedule "B" to Order-in-Council PC 2307 of April 17, 1952 for SAC overflights); and

(2) Any safety procedures applied by the Canadian authorities in accordance with requirements of the Atomic Energy Control Board and of the safety standards referred to in paragraph 4.

It should be noted that the phrase "the transport of these weapons in Canadian territory" would include not only the movement of these weapons between Goose or Harmon and the United States but also their movement between Goose and Harmon.

(f) Paragraphs 6 and 7:

These paragraphs should be considered in conjunction with paragraph 5. Paragraphs 5 and 6 set out the procedures which would govern transport of the weapons outside the base, either for logistic or for operational reasons, and paragraph 7 provides that removal of the weapons, either for logistic or operational reasons, will require approval of the Canadian government in accordance with the procedures established pursuant to paragraphs 5 and 6. In other words, the approval of the Canadian government for transporting the weapons for logistic reasons (following the same procedure as prescribed for overflights under Schedule "B") would at the same time constitute approval for the removal of the weapons from the storage site. Similarly the authorization of the Canadian government for the use of the weapons would at the same time constitute authority for their removal from the storage site for this purpose.

There are two points to note in connection with these paragraphs. The first is that paragraph 7 extends the area in which the USAF is permitted to handle the weapons from the "storage site" to "the areas utilized by the United States Forces" (i.e., the base). This phrase is suggested to meet the point made to you by the State Department that it is necessary to provide language to permit practice alerts and to meet training requirements, i.e., practice in arming aircraft and taxiing down the runway but not taking off. The second point arises out of the United States argument that the requirement of Canadian approval for removal of the weapons for operational use could seriously impair the ability of CINCNORAD to act rapidly in situations of grave emergency. Our new draft deals with this by specifying that the approval of the Canadian government will be given in accordance with the procedures established pursuant to paragraph 6. As you will appreciate, these procedures are spelled out in the MB-1 overflight agreement of June 30, 1959 and in the exchange of letters of September 30/October 2, 1959[38] between Mr. Heeney and Mr. Herter concerning states of readiness. The Canadian government regards the measure of control which it exercises through these agreements as essential.

(g) Paragraph 8:

No change.

(h) Paragraph 9:

The amendments to the paragraph proposed by the United States authorities are acceptable.

(i) Paragraph 10:

No change.

4. When presenting our re-draft to the State Department, I think that it would be useful if you were to stress that the government has made some important changes in its original proposals in order to facilitate agreement. We hope that the United States authorities, when considering our further proposals, will recognize the effort which has been made to reach a mutually acceptable text without sacrificing certain principles to which the government attaches the highest importance.

STORAGE OF AIR-TO-AIR NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

Accompanied by Air Vice Marshal Hendrick and Nutt I called on Kohler (Assistant Secretary European Affairs) this afternoon and passed over to him the revised Annex to the draft note on this subject and also a "piece of paper" based on the comments set out in paragraph 3 of your tel DL-337. (Copy of this "piece of paper" will go forward to you by tomorrow's bag.) Willoughby (Director, Office of Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs) and Burgess (Canadian Desk) were also present.

2. I commenced by pointing out that the redraft of the Annex contained a considerable number of changes over both the previous Canadian draft and USA redraft. I stressed that Canadian government had made the changes in its original proposals in an attempt to meet the rigidities with which USA was confronted and thus to facilitate agreement.

3. After reading over the Annex and "piece of paper" Kohler said that at first glance he thought that our suggestions came closer to meeting the difficulties posed by USA law and by operational requirements. He said that the USA authorities would study the revised Annex and our "piece of paper" but that in the meantime he had one or two preliminary inquiries. As you anticipated, he commented on the omission of the word, "custody." I indicated Canadian desire to avoid the word and explained that it seemed to us that the question of custody was not repeat not raised in view of the fact that the storage sites would be located on territory leased by USA. As lessee USA would be in full possession of weapons stored on the bases.

4. Kohler next asked what would be the role of Canadian representatives which under paragraph 3 of the Annex would be stationed at USA bases. I said that as I understood it their function would be to be in a position to "certify" as it were that obligations under paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the Annex had been discharged in accordance with Canadian requirements. Kohler said he thought there would be no repeat no problem regarding representatives and said that he fully understood that Canadian government must be able to certify that its requirements had been met.

5. Willoughby asked whether in sum of new draft annex required additional procedures for obtaining approval of Canadian government over and above those already in existence. In particular he referred to procedures concerning transport of weapons for logistical purposes. We called his attention to paragraph E of the "piece of paper" which contained comments regarding paragraph 5 of the draft annex pointing out that the procedures envisaged were those prescribed under schedule "B" to Order-in-Council PC 2307 and any which might be adopted by Canadian authorities in accordance with the requirements of the Atomic Energy Control Board and of the safety standards referred to in paragraph 4 of the draft annex. Regarding the requirements of the Atomic Energy Control Board Kohler expressed some concern whether this could result in unilateral action by Canada which could have the affect of prejudicing the storage programme. I pointed out that any regulations would have to be approved by Canadian government and that I assumed that wherever prospective regulations might appear to affect any agreement on storage there would be prior notice to and consultation with USA.

6. In conclusion I expressed the hope that in their future study of our redraft USA authorities would bear in mind the effort which the Canadian government had made to reach a mutually acceptable text. I stressed that questions concerning nuclear weapons are regarded by Canadian government as matters of high policy and indicated that certain principles were involved to which Canadian government attached the highest importance. I therefore hoped that USA government might see its way clear to accepting Canadian redraft with as few counter suggestions as possible.

STORAGE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

The following is the text of draft letter of understanding with regard to the most recent Canadian draft of agreement: Text Begins:

I refer to the Exchange of Notes, concluded today between our two governments, authorizing the storage at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base, Newfoundland, of such nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons as may be made available to USA forces under the operational control of CINCNORAD.

USA government regards this agreement as a significant forward step in the strengthening of continental air defense in the interest of both Canada and USA. We consider it essential, however, to assure that operations under the agreement will in practice satisfy the important military requirements involve, and will also remain within the limitations applicable to access to nuclear weapons and related classified information. For this reason, I consider it appropriate to set forth the understanding of USA government with respect to certain aspects of these arrangements.

First, it is our understanding that the provisions of this agreement do not repeat not in themselves authorize access by Canadian authorities to nuclear weapons or related classified (atomic) information. Such access remains within the scope of existing or future agreements between the two governments providing for the transfer of classified (atomic) information or for the availability of nuclear weapons to Canadian forces under appropriate conditions. Access to the storage sites by Canadian personnel shall be the subject of arrangements between the appropriate Canadian and USA authorities.

Second, it is our understanding that Canadian approval of the plans and procedures governing the operations of NORAD constitutes Canadian approval for the use of the weapons in accordance with those plans and procedures. We would therefore expect that when a state of air defense readiness has been declared by CINCNORAD in accordance with the agreement between our two governments concluded through an exchange of letters dated September 30/59 and October 2/59, the weapons could be removed from the leased areas and used operationally under the applicable rules for interception and engagement without the necessity for obtaining a further and specific Canadian authorization for operational use at the time. The effect of this understanding is simply to recognize that these arrangements are consistent with the conditions governing overflight of Canada by USA interceptors armed with nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons, as established in the agreement of June 30/59 between our two governments. It also assures that in a period of emergency there would be no repeat no procedural delays which could nullify the mutual defensive advantages of the forward deployment of the weapons.

I would greatly appreciate your confirmation that the Canadian Government shares the foregoing understandings. Text ends.

STORAGE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

We met with Willoughby (Director, Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs) this morning for further discussions on this question. Also present were Lang and Brownez of the Department of Defense, Rutter (Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Atomic Energy), Pender (Legal Department) and Burgess (Canadian Desk). Barton was able to accompany us.

2. Willoughby began by saying that USA authorities did not repeat not wish to propose amendments to the wording which he had submitted on March 31 (Your telegram DL-338 March 25). However it was desirable to ensure that there was a meeting of minds as to what was intended by our redraft, in two principal respects.

3. For the purpose a draft of a supplementary letter had been prepared incorporating USA understanding in particular of paragraphs 4 and 5 of our draft. Following some discussion we were requested to submit for consideration the text set out in our telegram 1056 April 22.

4. The purpose of paragraph 3 of the draft letter is, as indicated, to clarify that the agreement on storage, in particular paragraph 4, does not repeat not in itself authorize access by the Canadian authorities to classified (atomic) information nor to nuclear weapons, but that access would be governed by existing or future agreements. We pointed out that it was envisaged that there would be an exchange of correspondence between the two defence departments signifying the "agreement of Canada" after the RCAF has satisfied the Canadian government that the weapons to be stored would meet Canadian safety requirements (paragraph D(4) of your telegram DL-337 March 25). We further suggested that it would be desirable to move ahead quickly with these arrangements regarding safety requirements, since Canadian ministers would no repeat no doubt wish to be satisfied concerning these arrangements before finally approving the main agreement on storage.

5. We understand that Air Vice Marshal Hendrick, who accompanied us to the meeting, intends raising this matter with the RCAF in Ottawa. Lang of the Department of Defense expressed the readiness of that department to enter into discussions with the RCAF immediately with a view to reaching agreement on arrangements regarding safety requirements. The last sentence of paragraph 3 is intended to take account on the one hand, of the Goose Bay agreement which provides that the RCAF Commander shall have access to any part of the leased area, and on the other hand of the requirements of USA law regarding access to nuclear weapons.

6. The fourth paragraph of the draft letter reflects USA understanding that there would be no repeat no additional requirement for seeking further specific Canadian authorization for use of the weapons under the new agreement, over and above the requirement already provided for under existing agreements. Incidentally we recalled that the MB-1 agreement of June 30/59 was subject to renewal on an annual basis and that perhaps, therefore, there should be reference to further agreements. Lang hoped we would be prepared to let the reference to the agreement of June 30/59 stand without qualification; if there were any subsequent modifications to that agreement, these could at the time be related to the present understanding.

7. There is a further question which occurs to us, and which is relevant to the question of specific authorization, but which was not repeat not raised by USA side, that is the relationship of the proposed agreement on storage to overflight procedures. It would seem that, consistent with the proposed agreement on storage, schedule "B" to PC 2307 should cover logistic flights made under agreement. As presently drafted (your letter DL-286 March 31)[39] schedule "B" covers only logistic flights on behalf of SAC.

8. The question of publicity was raised. We said that while we had no repeat no instructions it was our understanding that the agreements would be classified. At the same time, in view of previous statements made in the House on the general subject of nuclear weapons, we thought that, at some stage, consideration would be given to an appropriate statement possibly in the context of a statement on the acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces.

9. It is envisaged by the State Department that the letter incorporating USA understanding concerning the storage agreement would be contained in a supplementary exchange of letters.

10. Willoughby said that he would want to clear with his superiors the final text of the proposed agreement and of the draft letter of understanding following consideration by Canadian officials, and also any outline of arrangements which might be agreed between the Department of Defense and the RCAF concerning safety arrangements. To facilitate consideration by Canadian ministers of the authoritative views of the administration, you may wish to let us have interim comments at the official level on the draft letter.

STORAGE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

Yesterday when I saw Willoughby (Director, Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs) he mentioned that he had had discussions with Barton in Arizona on this question. As matters stood the State Department had indicated to us (with Barton present) that the terms of the latest draft aide mémoire submitted by us were acceptable but that they would like to have an accompanying exchange of letters setting out their understanding of one or two points in the main agreement, viz., (1) that the agreement of itself would not give Canada access to nuclear weapons or to related classified atomic information, and (2) that with regard to use of the weapons, it was not intended that new procedures of consultation should be superimposed on those already provided for by the overflight procedures and the NORAD agreement on states of readiness.

2. In submitting this draft to us, Willoughby had asked if Canadian officials' reaction to it might be obtained before submitting it to Ministers. I understand that subsequently Barton expressed his and Ed Ritchie's view that the sort of letter the State Department had in mind might not really facilitate reaching agreement on the storage question. I understand from Willoughby that the situation now is that the United States authorities are reconsidered whether, from their point of view, a letter of understanding is really necessary.

3. Barton is writing to us about the position.[40] I think the important thing is that Ministers should be in no doubt as to the position regarding consultation.[41]

to Minister, Embassy in United States

Dear Saul [Rae],

As you know, the proposed agreement re Goose Bay and Harmon was on the PJBD agenda for the meeting which took place last week and when I joined forces with the Board, Dana and Freeman informed me of the initial reaction of officials (primarily Ed Ritchie) to the draft letter which Willoughby had given to us in Washington and which was sent to Ottawa by U.S. telegram 1056 of April 22. The reaction in Ottawa was that a letter of this kind would be quite unacceptable to Ministers and that, in particular, any attempt to spell out the meaning of the paragraphs related to the operational use of weapons could lead only to trouble. As a result, when the subject came up at the Board meeting, Mr. Wilgress said that while the officials in Ottawa understood the intent of the letter and had no real disagreement with the substantive points covered in it, they were of the opinion that the Canadian Government would find it difficult to subscribe to such specific phrasing. He added that the question of the storage of nuclear weapons in Canada is a sensitive one and the Canadian draft agreement had been worked out with great care in an attempt to meet the position of each Government consistent with public statements. The Canadian Government had, therefore, hoped that the United States authorities would be able to accept the draft agreement as it stood. In reply to a question from Dr. Hannah, Mr. Wilgress said that it would be preferable if the proposed letter were dropped since any attempt to spell out the intent of the agreement in a supplementary letter might well defeat the end purpose.

Subsequently, on instructions from Mr. Wilgress, I discussed the matter further with Mr. Willoughby. I said that while I thought the best course would be for the United States to accept the advice given by Mr. Wilgress, I recognized that they might have a point with respect to the matter of access to classified information and to storage sites. If after consideration they felt that they must seek clarification on these points, a possible alternative to the idea of a supplementary letter would be to propose the two following changes to the text of the agreement. The first change would be to add the following sentence to paragraph 3(a):

[40] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I enclose his letter. It raises (especially top of page 2) some interesting procedural suggestions — even problems! [S.F. Rae]

[41] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Obviously this continues to be very sensitive [A.D.P. Heeney]

"Arrangements for access to the storage sites by Canadian personnel will be made as required between the appropriate Canadian and United States authorities."

The second change would be to insert a new paragraph between paragraph 3(b) and paragraph 4. This new paragraph would read as follows:

"Access by Canadian authorities to the nuclear weapons or related classified (atomic) information shall be subject to the terms of existing or future agreements between the two Governments providing for the transfer of such information."

I made it clear that these suggestions were purely personal and that I had no assurance that they would be acceptable to the Canadian authorities.

Mr. Willoughby said that he would have to reconsider the situation in consultation with officials from the Defense Department when he returned to Washington and that, in the meantime, he would like us to regard his suggested draft letter as a purely informal proposal which we should "sit on" for the time being.

I think this brings you up to date on what happened since I saw you; no doubt Mr. Willoughby will be getting in touch with you to report the next exciting chapter in due course. In the meantime, the BOMARC crisis has burst about our ears and I am somewhat pessimistic about the effect it may have on all these negotiations.

I enjoyed my visit in Washington very much and am most grateful for the many kindnesses extended to me by you and your cohorts.

Best regards,

BILL [BARTON]

STORAGE OF NUCLEAR AIR-TO-AIR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

Pursuant to your request, I saw Willoughby the other day and was handed the attached piece of paper[42] which sets forth two proposed amendments to the Canadian draft agreement (flagged).

2. Willoughby offered no reasons other than to say that the amendments were intended to take care of United States "difficulties." He suggested that we might meet with the experts who could outline the reasons for the suggested amendments.

3. Asked for my impression of the suggestions, I said offhand that the amendment to paragraph 2 left a bit of a monstrosity from a drafting point of view. What did "shall remain with" include? I thought by deleting "ownership," "custody" was included again by implication. I wondered whether the inclusion of a reference to the United States Atomic Energy Act in paragraph 3(a) might not be construed as derogating in some way from the terms of the Leased Bases Agreement and the Goose Bay Agreement.

[42] Non retrouvé./Not located.

4. In the meantime, I passed on the suggestions to Tovell. On Friday Barton called to say that he and Ed Ritchie had considered the suggestions and that they were not happy about them.

5. The amendment to paragraph 2, they thought, not only left an awkwardly drafted provision; it also drew attention to the absence of "custody." (On the other hand the specific reference to "ownership" draws attention to the absence of custody from a United States point of view, more so than the omission of "ownership.") I think our point should be that deletion of "ownership" can be argued to reinstate "custody" at least by implication. We could then reiterate our point that, from the United States point of view, they could consider that the issue of custody did not arise in the case of leased areas.

6. The amendment to paragraph 3(a), they thought, imputed an extra-territorial effect to United States legislation. Within the terms of the Leased Bases Agreement, the United States could apply the Act. The Act does not bind Canada as such, but only as it is applicable under the United States under the terms of the Leased Bases Agreement. To propose inclusion of the reference to the Act might be to risk misinterpretation.

7. Barton suggested that I have a private word with Willoughby to point out that further "nit-picking" might prejudice the whole Agreement and to urge him that time may be of the essence.

8. If you agree, I shall get in touch with Willoughby and pass on these views, leaving it to him to decide where he wishes to go from here, i.e. the meeting of the experts or reconsideration on the basis of our informal official-level views. If he decides on the meeting, would you attend? Air Vice Marshal Hendrick has attended previous meetings. If you agree, I think we might include him.[43]

STORAGE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

On June 9 Willoughby, Director of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, passed to us on an informal basis two suggested amendments (flagged) to the Canadian draft of the Harmon-Goose Bay "Storage" Agreement (flagged). These amendments would delete the reference to "ownership" in paragraph 2 of the Canadian draft and would insert a reference to the Atomic Energy Act in paragraph 3(a).

2. The sense of these amendments were outlined to Barton on the telephone on June 10. Following discussion with Ritchie, Barton reiterated the view which he had previously expressed to Willoughby on a private basis at the last PJBD meeting, that an attempt to amend the Canadian draft would be unlikely to meet with success. He also thought that the proposed amendments in themselves were open to objection (see paragraphs 5 and 6 of the memorandum of June 13). Barton suggested that we have a private word with Willoughby to impress upon him that any attempt to amend the draft might prejudice the whole arrangement.

[43] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I have spoken — emphatically — to Willoughby. He will probably want a meeting anyway & will be in touch with you. You should have A/V/M/ with you. June 13 [A.D.P. Heeney]

3. Following this conversation, the Ambassador spoke to Willoughby on June 13 and urged upon him strongly that the United States should not put these, or any other, changes to us but accept the draft as is. In the meantime, however, Willoughby had arranged an informal meeting for the purpose of explaining the United States situation.

4. Accordingly, on June 14 Nutt attended a meeting at the State Department for the purpose of further exploration of the United States difficulties in connection with our proposed draft for the Agreement. He was accompanied by Air Vice Marshal Hendrick and Colonel MacDonald, Executive Staff Officer. United States officials at the meeting were Woodie Willoughby, Carlson and Burgess (Canadian Desk), Rutter (Atomic Energy Section, Department of State), Pender (Legal Department, Department of State), Murray Comarow (Air Force Legal Counsel) and Raymond Brownez (Department of Defense).

5. Comarow led off with an explanation of the reasons for the two suggested amendments. He said both were concerned with the same problem — "custody." The United States desired to delete "ownership" because, with our deletion of "custody," paragraph 2, they contended, implied that the United States would not have custody. The reason for inserting in paragraph 3(a) the reference to the Atomic Energy Act was to identify the criteria which would govern storage. In other words, what the United States officials wanted to achieve was acknowledgement by us of United States requirements and an indication that these requirements are in turn consistent with the Goose Bay and Harmon Leases.

6. Comarow said that as we no doubt realized, very little flexibility was allowed to the Executive in matters of this kind. "Custody and control" was a legal requirement which, though not specified in so many words in the Atomic Energy Act, had grown out of legislative practice. Absence of provisions clearly indicating that this legal requirement was being met would also create a political problem. He conceded that, it might be possible, in our terms, to get around the legal problem; the political difficulty was much greater. The Congressional committee was demanding. In all other agreements there was a clear provision for "custody." Nor was it just a question of what appeared in the Agreement. The law went to the factual situation, and so would the Committee counsel. The reason for their present proposed amendments was not technical; the Air Force would like to be able to accept our draft. But they feared that the Joint Committee would feel it could not.

7. We pointed out that the Canadian Government had come a long way towards facilitating the storage of weapons at Harmon and Goose Bay. Surely Congress, as well as the Administration, was anxious that agreement be reached. We thought, therefore, that it should be urged upon Congress that the Agreement as it stood accomplished its purpose without prejudicing the United States legal requirement. We pressed again the argument that, because of the Base Agreements, the problem of custody really did not arise. Comarow seemed prepared to accept this argument in respect of Harmon but pointed out that, under the Goose Bay Agreement, the Canadian commander was granted free access to the United States leased area. This was the real stumbling block to the argument that the question of custody did not arise.

8. One or two alternative suggestions to the amendments already put forward to paragraphs 2 and 3(a) of the draft were put forward. The first (and this was the favoured one) was that the specific reference to the United States Atomic Energy Act be dropped and that there be substituted the words "its legal requirements" or just "its laws." There was some suggestion that, if this formula could be accepted, paragraph 2 might stand as it is now, although Comarow clearly preferred to see specific reference to "ownership" deleted. Another suggestion was that there might be a "minute" which would indicate that the question of custody and control did not arise because, under the existing Bases Agreements, the United States already would have custody and control. In effect, by this means the Canadian Government would be inferring that it would not construe the Goose Bay Agreement in such a fashion as to encroach upon United States custody and control of nuclear weapons stored at Goose Bay. We said we thought that the same objection would apply to this suggestion as to that of a letter which had been broached earlier by United States officials. Yet another suggestion was that Canadian Ministers might be asked to approve detailed United States security arrangements which would include an indication of how our inspectors would fit into the scheme of things. Such approval would imply an intention by Canada not to invoke the omnibus rights of access under the Goose Bay Agreement. There might then be a possibility of the Administration presenting a case to Congress on the basis that, except for the one point in the Goose Bay Agreement, the question of custody and control did not arise and that, as regards the Goose Bay Agreement, the Canadian Government had approved rules and regulations regarding security of the storage site which clearly indicated its intention not to invoke its full rights under the Goose Bay Agreement, at least insofar as they might impinge upon United States requirements for custody and control.

9. In conclusion, we agreed to consider at the official level the views that had been expressed but we again urged United States officials to reconsider earnestly the possibility of accepting the draft agreement as it stood. If further United States changes were put before Ministers, there would be real difficulties and certainly more delays.

10. (It should be mentioned that Brownez of the Department of Defense also queried the Canadian Government's intention in connection with paragraphs 6 and 7. The United States had previously expressed concern that the Canadian requirement for approval of removal of the weapons for operational use could seriously impair the ability of CINCNORAD to act rapidly in situations of grave emergency. We had informed the State Department that our new draft dealt with this problem by specifying that the approval of the Canadian Government "will be given" in accordance with the procedures established pursuant to paragraph 6, i.e. the procedures spelled out in the MB-1 Overflight Agreement of June 30, 1959 and in the exchange of letters of September 30/October 2, 1959 between the Ambassador and Mr. Herter concerning NORAD's state of readiness. Brownez's specific question was whether the expression, "will be given," inferred an intention on the part of the Canadian Government that there should be consultation regarding removal for possible use of the weapons in addition to the procedures already established. We replied that our understanding was that the clarification offered was intended to dispel doubts on this point and that the situation envisaged was that existing procedures would govern. Brownez also asked whether it would be our understanding that, if in accordance with the MB-1 Agreement United States interceptors based in the United States were overflying Canada, interceptors stationed at Harmon and Goose Bay would, under the "Storage" Agreement plus the MB-1 Agreement, be permitted to become airborne. We replied that in our own opinion this would be a logical interpretation.)

11. We were informed by Burgess (Canadian Desk) on June 15 that Willoughby was urging acceptance of our draft of the Agreement as it stands.

12. On June 17 Willoughby raised the matter again and emphasized that in his view it was important to get a final reaction from officials in Ottawa as soon as possible. He feared that if the matter were not settled one way or the other before the Ministerial Meeting next month, it would no doubt come up before the Committee with undesirable repercussions. He therefore hoped that we would be able to say as soon as possible whether we thought that some further accommodation of the United States difficulties might have promise of acceptance or, alternatively, whether we thought they would not. In the latter event, it would be for the United States to determine whether it would accept the offer of storage on our terms or whether they would demur.

13. In view of the foregoing, it was decided that instead of reporting on the meeting of June 14 in a personal letter we would report by telephone to officials in Ottawa. Consequently, Nutt spoke to Barton along the lines of paragraphs 5 to 9 of this memorandum. Later, after having spoken to Ritchie, Barton returned the call to say that they were both of the opinion that suggested amendments would be unlikely to be accepted. Barton even thought that Canadian Ministers might feel that they had gone really further than they wanted in agreeing to storage at Goose Bay and Harmon and that they might welcome an occasion to reconsider this view. He pointed out that Canadian Ministers have preoccupations regarding this matter just as the United States Congress does; that we had already come a long way in meeting the United States requirements and that the United States should accept what was proffered unless they want to risk prejudicing the whole arrangement.

14. Subsequently the same day (June 17) the Ambassador spoke to Willoughby, pointing out that officials in Ottawa had given serious and urgent consideration to the United States difficulties as presented at the meeting of June 14. the Ambassador said that the consensus of purely official opinion, in which he shared, was that any new proposals would be turned down and that this would have generally adverse results. The Ambassador reiterated Canadian official's feeling that the Canadian Government had come a long way in accommodating the United States desire to store nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon. While in theory the letter of United States law might not have been met, there would, he thought, be no problem in the actual practical implementation of the Agreement as proposed by Canada. He said that Willoughby might say that the judgement of senior Canadian officials was categorical regarding the chances of getting acceptance of amendments or riders to the Agreement as proffered. Willoughby undertook to canvass United States officials concerned and to indicate to us as soon as possible what the United States contemplated doing by way of a formal reply to the Canadian proposal of June, 1959.

STORAGE OF AIR-TO-AIR NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

This will confirm that Willoughby informed me on Saturday that he believed that the text of the Canadian draft of the Annex to the proposed Exchange of Notes on this matter, contained in your telegram DL-338 of March 25, would be acceptable to the USA provided the following provision could be added to paragraph 7 of the Annex or, alternatively, provided it could be added to the related paragraph in the explanatory comments which you authorized us in your telegram DL-337 March 25 to incorporate in a "piece of paper" to be left with the State Department. (A copy of this "piece of paper" was referred to you under cover of our letter 501 dated April 1.)† The additional provision would read:

"It is understood that these procedures shall not impair the right of the United States to return the weapons to the United States whenever it may deem it appropriate."

2. If it were agreeable that such a provision be included in the explanatory comments, this would involve the comments being given "appropriate status" so that they could be used in presenting the Exchange of Notes to the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy. In other words, the State Department would wish to be able to indicate that the explanatory comments represented the considered views of the Canadian Government. It would be understood that both the comments and the Exchange of Notes would remain classified.

3. We understand that this is the position recommended to USA Ministers on the discussion of this item in the Joint Ministerial Committee.[44]

TOP SECRET Ottawa, September 21, 1960

My Dear Colleague:

STORAGE OF NUCLEAR AIR-TO-AIR DEFENSIVE WEAPONS AT GOOSE BAY AND HARMON

In a note of 9 April 1959,[45] the United States requested permission to stockpile air-to-air defensive nuclear weapons at Goose Bay, Labrador, for the use of the United States Air Force interceptor squadron defending that base. In a subsequent note, it was requested that, in addition, authority be given to store similar nuclear weapons at Harmon Air Force Base, Newfoundland.

At its meeting of 22 September, 1959, the Cabinet approved the text of a draft note[46] to be sent to the United States to initiate negotiations of an agreement for the storage of such weapons at the sites mentioned above.

Subsequent to receiving American comments on the draft note referred to above, Cabinet approved, on 22 March, 1960, a further revised draft which was later conveyed to the State Department.

Up to the time of the meeting of 12-13 July, 1960, at Montebello of the Canada-United States Committee on Joint Defence, formal reaction of the United States to the latest Canadian draft had not been received, although it had been informally indicated by the United States that no amendments to the redraft would be proposed. However, the United States authorities considered it desirable to ensure that there was agreement as to what was intended by the Canadian redraft on two principal points, and in this respect a draft of a letter of understanding had been prepared by the United States.

At the meeting of the Joint Defence Committee, Mr. Merchant, U.S. Under-Secretary of State, stated that the United States was prepared to accept the revised draft provided two points could be met. These were:

[44] Voir/See document 302.
[45] Voir/See Volume 26, document 173.
[46] Voir/See Volume 26, document 181.

(a) the inclusion in the agreement of a provision to the effect that the procedures regarding Canadian control over the movements of the weapons in Canada would not impair the right of the United States to return the weapons to the United States whenever it might deem it appropriate; and

(b) some status to be attached to explanatory comments provided by the Canadian Ambassador at the time the Canadian redraft was presented to the State Department last March (i.e. a letter of understanding).

In replying to Mr. Merchant, you undertook to clear up these points and suggested that a new paragraph 8 in the Annex to the draft might be inserted to read as follows:

"The above provisions will be applied in such a manner as to permit the return of the weapons to the United States at any time at the request of the United States Government."

At the 24 August, 1960, Meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the Chairman of the United States Section, having commented on the fact that the United States Representatives at the July Meeting of the Joint Committee on Defence received the impression that the two governments were in agreement and that Canadian Cabinet approval was imminent, observed that the United States feels that storage at Goose Bay and Harmon is of first importance in obtaining the optimum defence capability of NORAD. He expressed the hope that the agreement can be concluded as soon as possible. I understand that you have received a report† on the U.S. attitude on this matter from the Chairman of the Canadian Section, Mr. Wilgress.

We have been dealing with this matter for well over a year and in the light of discussions at Montebello, it would be difficult to justify any further delay. I concur in the view that these weapons are required to give NORAD an increased defensive capability and I urge that arrangements for the exchange of notes now be concluded.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE PEARKES

PART I — ACQUISITION AND CONTROL OF ATOMIC WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES IN CANADA AND EUROPE

1. It will be recalled that on 15 October 1958 the Cabinet authorized negotiations with the United States military authorities in regard to the acquisition and storage of defensive nuclear weapons for use by Canadian forces in Europe and in Canada.[48] These discussions have taken place and a suggested procedure for the acquisition and storage of defensive nuclear weapons for Canadian forces was developed. The problems connected with the acquisition and control of defensive nuclear weapons for Canadian forces were reviewed by the Canada-United States Committee on Joint Defence at a meeting held in Paris on 15 December 1958.[49] As a result of the deliberations of the Canada-United States Committee on Joint Defence, a statement was made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on 20 February[50] which outlined the Canadian government position.

2. During this same period the negotiations between the United States and Canadian Chiefs of Staff on the general principles regarding the acquisition of these weapons were completed, and on 1 May the Chairman of the United States Chiefs of Staff forwarded a letter to the Chairman of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff in which the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff outlined the general arrangements for the provision of atomic weapons for the Canadian forces. A copy of this paper is attached as Appendix "A".[51] This letter suggested that there should be a government-to-government exchange of notes covering the general principles relative to the provision of United States atomic weapons to Canada and that this exchange should cover such things as broad requirements for United States custody and control, and Canadian responsibilities for the provision of storage facilities, security and the broad system of safety requirements. It further suggested that arrangements for the acquisition of nuclear weapons for forces committed to NATO should be consistent with the NATO atomic stockpile concept. The letter further explained that the detailed technical arrangements pertaining to custody and control would be accomplished on a bilateral basis with the United States commanders under which the Canadian forces would operate; such as, the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic for maritime forces, the Supreme Allied Commander Europe for forces in Europe, and the Commander-in-Chief, North American Air Defence Command, for the air defence forces of North America.

3. After receipt of this memorandum arrangements were then made to draft the proposed general bilateral agreement for the acquisition of nuclear warheads for the Canadian forces. A draft general agreement has now been drawn up in consonance with the arrangements suggested in the letter from the Chairman of the United States Chiefs of Staff. This draft has been reviewed by the interested government departments and was considered and amended by the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions on 4 December. The Panel recommended that the ministers closely concerned with this question should be requested to authorize our Embassy in Washington to commence negotiations with the United States authorities for the completion of this note. The Minister of National Defence indicated his approval on 15 December, and approval of the other ministers concerned is now being sought to commence the negotiations. If and when this proposed agreement is signed, negotiations will then be opened with the Supreme Allied Commanders concerned for the detailed agreements for the acquisition and control of nuclear weapons and warheads, as follows:

(a) with the Supreme Allied Commander Europe for the forces in Europe;

(b) with the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic for the maritime forces; and

(c) with the Commander-in-Chief NORAD for the air defence forces in North America.

A copy of the proposed note is attached as Appendix "B".[52]

PART II — BOMARC "B" (GROUND TO AIR MISSILE)

Subsequent to the approval in principle of the installation of two BOMARC bases in Northern Ontario and Quebec by Cabinet on the 21st of September, 1958,[53] negotiations were opened with United States authorities in respect to an equitable sharing of the cost of this and allied air defence programmes. Although basic agreement has been reached, the formal exchange of notes has not yet been completed.

2. A detailed implementation plan for completing the joint air defence programmes including BOMARC was agreed the 13th of July, 1959. Essentially this plan provides that Canada will undertake all construction and the United States will provide the technical equipment (using Canadian source to the maximum extent).

3. The contract for construction at the North Bay site has been let to the Foundation Company of Ontario and the contractor was formally notified to begin construction on the 14th of December, 1959. Request for tenders for construction at the La Macaza site is scheduled for the 11th of January, 1960, and opening of tenders is planned for the 10th of February, 1960.

4. Development of the BOMARC "B" missile is progressing on schedule and the first missile to be delivered to Canada is programmed for July 1961. The joint implementation plan calls for the La Macaza and North Bay sites to be operationally ready by the 1st of February, 1962, and the 1st of March, 1962, respectively, and to be fully combat ready two months later. It is expected that this programme will be completed in accordance with the above time schedule.

5. The BOMARC "B" when installed will be capable of utilizing either a high explosive or a nuclear warhead. The Canadian share of the cost for the BOMARC portion of the joint air defence programme is $17,290,000.

PART III — NEW AIRCRAFT FOR THE ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE IN CANADA

(a) ARGUS (Maritime Patrol Aircraft)

On 10 January 1958 Cabinet approved the procurement of an additional eight Argus aircraft. The last of these aircraft will be delivered to the R.C.A.F. in September 1960, completing the total programme of 33 Argus for use in Maritime Air Command. Total expenditures on this programme will amount to $226,675,000.

(b) CC106 (Long Range Transport Aircraft)

On 16 December 1958 Treasury Board approved the letting of a contract for four additional CC106 long-range transport aircraft making a total order to date of twelve. The first of these aircraft was delivered in November 1959 and production is on schedule with the twelfth aircraft programmed for delivery in March 1961. Total expenditures on this programme will amount to $127,398,000.

(c) CC109 (Intermediate Range Transport Aircraft)

Cabinet approved the procurement of ten CC109 intermediate range transport aircraft on 5 February 1958. Delivery of the first production aircraft is scheduled for January 1960 and the contract will be completed in August 1960. Total funds allotted for this programme are $23,900,000.

(d) SA16B (Albatross) (Amphibious Search and Rescue Aircraft)

Cabinet approved the procurement of ten SA16B aircraft for search and rescue on 3 February 1959. The first aircraft will be delivered in August 1960 and the tenth in January 1961. Total funds allotted for this programme are $13,391,000.

(e) OTTER (Short Range Transport Aircraft)

On 10 August 1959 Treasury Board approved the placing of an order for 27 Otter aircraft to re-equip the R.C.A.F. Auxiliary flying squadrons. The first aircraft will be delivered in March 1960 and the contract will be completed in December 1960. Total funds committed are $3,956,000.

(f) Replacement for the CF100

On the 21 September 1958 the Cabinet decided that ... "the Chiefs of Staff should investigate and report upon the requirements, if any, for additional air defence missile installations in Canada and for interceptor aircraft of the nature of the CF105 or alternative types" ... A submission based on this report has been circulated to members of the Cabinet and now awaits a Cabinet decision.[54]

PART IV — RE-EQUIPMENT AT 1 AIR DIVISION (CF104)

On the 14th of August, 1958, Cabinet approved procurement of the CF104 (Lockheed F104G) aircraft to replace the F86 aircraft in 1 Air Division. The Federal Republic of Germany and the Kingdom of The Netherlands have also selected this aircraft for their air forces in Europe. It is expected that a decision to adopt this same aircraft will be made by the Government of Belgium very shortly. Close liaison is being maintained with these countries to ensure that all possible economy is effected in production. For example, the engineering costs for redesigning and converting the existing F104 aircraft to the F104G (CF104) model are to be divided between Canada and Germany.

2. Letters of intent have been issued to Canadair Limited for the airframes and Orenda Engines Limited for the engines, with final contracts to be signed in the very near future. A contract for the fire control system has been let to the Westinghouse Company Limited.

3. The first production aircraft from Canadair will be delivered in July 1961 and the contract will be completed in September 1963. In addition, fourteen dual trainers are being obtained from Lockheed Company with delivery beginning in August 1961 and ending in February 1962.

4. Total cost of this programme is of the order of $450 million.

5. Attached is a copy of a memorandum dated 4 January, 1960 from the Chief of the Air Staff outlining the present status of the CF104 programme.†

Minister of National Defence to Prime Minister

Ottawa, January 11, 1960

My dear Prime Minister,

May I refer to your conversation with me this afternoon.

[54] Voir/See document 292.

On the 6th of January I forwarded to you a four part memorandum, part I of which was entitled "Acquisition and Control of Atomic Weapons for Canadian Forces in Canada and Europe." Attached to this part of the memorandum as Appendix "B" was a draft copy of the "Draft of Proposed Agreement with the United States on the Acquisition of Nuclear Warheads for Canadian Forces." Paragraph 3 of the annex to this draft note refers in general terms to the storage and employment (use) of nuclear weapons. The meaning conveyed by this paragraph of the draft note would be made clearer by the addition of a sentence to the effect that "it being understood that when these weapons are released, the responsibility for their use will rest with the Canadian government."

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE PEARKES

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

4. The Prime Minister said that, during the debate on the address next week, it would be necessary for him to deal with the question of nuclear weapons for the use of Canada's armed forces and for U.S. forces stationed on Canadian soil. The government had agreed in principle to the storage of defensive nuclear weapons in Canada, subject to the consideration of the problems involved in storage of naval weapons at Argentia. A decision on the U.S. request for storage of strategic nuclear weapons at Goose Bay had been deferred. A draft note concerning storage of defensive nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Field for the use of U.S. forces had been approved and was being considered by the U.S. authorities.[55]

There remained outstanding, the problem of negotiating an agreement for the acquisition of defensive nuclear weapons for the use of Canadian forces, in respect of which a draft agreement had been prepared for transmission to the United States. He understood that the government had decided, in the interest of limiting the spread of nuclear weapons, that ownership of warheads would remain with the United States but that decisions on their use rested with Canada. He was convinced that no agreement should be signed with the U.S. on this matter unless it was quite clear that there would be no use of these weapons without the consent of the Canadian government. During the debate in the House of Commons next week, he wanted to be in a position to say that negotiations were going on but that Canada would insist on having the final decision as to the use of any nuclear weapons it might acquire as a result of the negotiations. The wording in the draft agreement on this point was not clear enough and would have to be revised. It might be necessary, too, to have a separate agreement for weapons for use in Europe.

5. The Minister of National Defence pointed out that, to meet the Canadian contention that custody of any nuclear weapons should be a joint responsibility, it had been suggested that the "internal" security of the storage sites should be a U.S. responsibility and the "external" security of that site a Canadian responsibility. The United States were prepared to accept such an arrangement. This would enable the Canadian authorities to say that these weapons could not be used without the consent of the Canadian government. The same would apply to nuclear weapons that might be acquired for Canadian forces in Europe.

6. The Cabinet agreed that it should be stated that in the negotiations with the United States for the acquisition of defensive nuclear weapons for Canadian forces, Canada's position would be that the custody of these weapons would be the joint responsibility of both countries but that they would only be used by the Canadian forces with the consent of the Canadian government.

Memorandum from Secretary to Cabinet
to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], January 13, 1960

General Foulkes tells me that Mr. Pearkes informed him that you felt there should be something in our proposed exchange of notes with the United States that would make clear that responsibility for the use of the nuclear weapons we obtain from the United States would be that of the Government of Canada.

Foulkes discussed briefly with me some words that might be added to paragraph 3 in section (b) of the Annex to the draft note. On reflection I would suggest that we should have a separate paragraph that would state approximately the following:

"The use of the nuclear warheads covered by this agreement subsequent to their release in accordance with paragraph 3 will be the responsibility of the Government of Canada."

[55] Voir/See Volume 26, document 181.

It may be better to avoid the implication that we will be controlling the details of the use of these weapons by our forces under the NATO Commander in Europe. This could be avoided by the following:

"Authorization of the use by Canadian Forces of the nuclear warheads covered by this Agreement subsequent to their release in accordance with paragraph 3, will be the responsibility of the Government of Canada."

If either of these are included, it might perhaps be well in paragraph 3 to say that the "warheads will be released for use will vary, etc." This would help to make clear that it is procedure for release that is the subject of agreement and the responsibility for use will remain with Canada.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], January 13, 1960

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS FOR THE CANADIAN FORCES

I understand that in the discussion in Cabinet yesterday of the draft agreement on the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian Forces, it was agreed that changes should be considered to deal with two points:

(a) the concept of joint custody of the warheads;

(b) the need for an explicit statement of Canadian responsibility for any decision that the warheads should be used by Canadian Forces.

The Department of National Defence has been most desirous that the agreement should be comprehensive, covering the acquisition of the warheads for our Forces both in Canada and in Europe. It was necessary, therefore, to deal with the question of custody at three separate points in the text. Paragraph 2 stated that the custody of the weapons themselves would be the responsibility of the United States, paragraph 6(e) provided that Canada would be responsible for the external security of the weapons in storage or during movement in Canada, and paragraphs 14 and 15 dealt with the more complicated situation which can be expected in Europe, where the storage depots may be used jointly by several NATO countries.

In order to provide a more explicit statement of the situation with respect to custody, I suggest that paragraph 2 might be strengthened by amending it to read as follows:

"2. Ownership of any stocks of nuclear warheads will remain with the United States. Except in cases when the sharing of storage facilities with other Allied Governments requires otherwise, custody of the warheads will be the joint responsibility of Canada and the United States, to be exercised as follows:

(a) United States personnel, to be provided in the minimum numbers required, will maintain physical possession of the warheads;

(b) Canada will be responsible for the external security of the warheads."

The references to custody in other sections of the agreement would be left unchanged.

In order to provide an explicit statement in the agreement of Canadian responsibility for the decision to use the warheads, I would suggest the adoption of the final set of words proposed by Mr. Bryce in a memorandum to the Prime Minister dated January 13 (a copy of which I believe was given to you). This proposal would involve two changes:

(a) the substitution of the words "for use" in place of "and employed" in paragraph 3, thus making it clear that it is the "procedure for release" of the warheads that is to be the subject of separate governmental agreements, and not the use of the weapons, which is a responsibility of the Canadian Government;

(b) the addition of a new paragraph, to follow paragraph 3 and to read as follows:

"Authorization of the use by Canadian Forces of the nuclear warheads covered by this agreement subsequent to their release in accordance with paragraph 3, will be the responsibility of the Government of Canada."

Attached for your signature, if you approve, is a letter to the Minister of National Defence,† seeking his concurrence to the changes proposed above. An extra copy is attached in case you wish to send it to the Prime Minister for his information.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES
(Previous reference January 12)

14. The Prime Minister read paragraphs which had been drafted on the acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces for inclusion in his remarks on the debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that a public statement along the lines proposed would cause widespread repercussions. As far as Canada itself was concerned, the references to U.S. control appeared unsuitable. He had understood control would be joint.

16. Mr. Diefenbaker went on to say that most statements on defence policy had been rather foggy and that the Canadian people were becoming aroused over what appeared to be a confused situation. He felt that the policies of the U.S.S.R. still constituted a threat to peace. Khrushchev's statement of only yesterday was bellicose in its reference to I.C.B.M.'s.[56] The U.S.S.R. Ambassador had told him, in regard to Soviet rocket tests in the Pacific, that the U.S.S.R. needed an area 7,000 miles in length for their tests; a significant admission.

It was absolutely necessary that the Cabinet be quite clear in its attitude towards nuclear weapons for the Canadian forces and that he be in a position to make a clear statement on the matter on Monday in the House of Commons. To assist in this a Committee of Ministers should review the draft, for consideration in the next day or so.

17. The Cabinet agreed that a Committee consisting of Messrs. Green, Pearkes, Fulton, Nowlan, and MacLean be constituted to re-draft the statement, for use by the Prime Minister, on the question of acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canada's forces.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

Mr. Ross Martin came to see me this morning to inform me of the following developments:

2. Mr. Bryce, who had obtained informally a copy of the proposed changes in the Acquisition Agreement which we prepared yesterday, has shown them to General Foulkes who thought that they were satisfactory from the point of view of the Department of National Defence. He has also prepared the attached draft paragraphs for possible inclusion in the Prime Minister's speech. In addition, he has shown the proposed amendments to the Agreement to the Prime Minister who was inclined to think that they were satisfactory.

3. Mr. Martin said that Mr. Bryce would like to have our comments on the attached draft and, in particular, would like to know:

(a) What changes, if any, would need to be made to the Agreement to correspond to the statement of policy in the draft, and

(b) Whether there is any element in the statement which would create difficulties in our negotiations with the United States.

4. I am of the opinion that with the changes which we proposed yesterday, the Agreement will correspond to the attached draft statement of Canadian policy. The only point of principle upon which I would anticipate possible trouble with the United States is our use of the words

"joint custody." I do not believe the United States will quarrel with the concept as we have enunciated it, i.e. that the weapons themselves will be maintained and safeguarded by United States personnel and that Canadian Forces will be responsible for external security, but they may well object to calling such an arrangement "joint custody" since they have used the word "custody" in a more limited sense in agreements with other governments. Apart from this point. I would suggest the following changes in the draft statement:

(a) In line 7 of paragraph 2 and lines 14 and 15 of paragraph 4, I would reverse the order of reference to the President of the United States and the Canadian Government.

(b) I would be inclined to terminate the first sentence of paragraph 3 after the words "Canadian Government," deleting the parenthetical reference to the possibility that an individual member of the Government might exercise the authority to authorize the use of the weapons.

(c) In order to deal with the special situation which may exist in Europe, I would suggest rewording the remainder of paragraph 3 to read as follows: "In Canada we contemplate arrangements being made by which these warheads will be stored in special facilities on our bases. The warheads will remain the property of the United States, maintained and safeguarded by the minimum of U.S. personnel required to discharge these duties. These storage and maintenance facilities will be guarded by Canadian Forces who will thus be responsible for the external security of the storage site. Some modification of these arrangements may be necessary at Canadian bases in Europe, where it is expected that common NATO storage facilities will be provided."

(d) Mr. Bryce dealt with the question of the release of the weapons as a part of paragraph 3. I would suggest that this become a new paragraph and that the sentence which reads: "Their release from U.S. control would be a U.S. decision" be deleted since it seems to me to be capable of misinterpretation and does not really add anything to the explanation of the arrangements which would be in effect. Another possible change which Mr. Ross Campbell thought might be desirable, but which I am not convinced is necessary, is to delete the reference to "operational control" in the final sentence and to amend the sentence to read as follows: "This Canadian decision would be put into effect through the Commanders of NORAD, SACLANT or SACEUR, under whom the Canadian units would be serving."

5. I am attaching an extra copy of this memorandum in case you wish to pass it to Mr. Bryce.

DRAFT PARAGRAPH RE NUCLEAR WARHEADS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

Our policy in making arrangements with the United States on this matter is based on two main principles.

The first is that, in accordance with my statement of last February, nuclear warheads for defensive weapons to be used by Canadian forces will be obtained from the United States and will remain under U.S. ownership, stored on Canadian or NATO bases and under joint custody until such time as they are released by decision of the President of the United States and the Canadian Government. If the bases are in third countries, for example in Europe, the concurrence of a third government or of a NATO authority may also be required.

The second point about which there should be no doubt is that the decision to authorize the Canadian forces to use these weapons will be taken by the Canadian Government or a designated member of it, such as myself or the Minister of National Defence if he cannot reach me.

We contemplate arrangements being made by which these warheads will be stored in special facilities on our Canadian bases. The warheads will remain the property of the United States, maintained and safeguarded by the minimum of U.S. personnel required to discharge these duties. These storage and maintenance facilities will be guarded by Canadian forces who will thus be responsible for the external security of the storage site. At certain stages of readiness or alerts declared on the occasion of a threatened attack or the outbreak of war, these warheads would have to be mounted on the appropriate weapons and vehicles, such as aircraft. Their transfer from storage for this purpose under these conditions would be made in accordance with decisions and orders of the President of the United States and the Government of Canada. Their release from U.S. control would be a U.S. decision. Their use by the Canadian forces would be a Canadian decision. This Canadian decision would be put into effect through the Commanders of NORAD, SACLANT or SACEUR having operational control of the Canadian units.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES
(Previous reference January 14)

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the Committee of Ministers set up for the purpose had prepared another draft of a statement for the Prime Minister to use on the question of acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canada's forces. Word might come at any moment from Washington on the negotiations concerning defensive weapons for U.S. forces at Goose Bay and Harmon Field which might have a bearing on the statement to be made in Parliament next week.

7. The Prime Minister reiterated his view that the subject about which the public was most concerned was defence and its relations with the United States. He had to be able to say that, in so far as defensive weapons for Canada's forces were concerned, the government had the right of joint custody and the ultimate decision as to their use. If the U.S wanted to deny Canada these principles that was a U.S. decision. Khrushchev's recent statement about the phasing out of bombers in the U.S.S.R. — and his statements on defence matters had usually turned out to be accurate — proved the wisdom of the government's decision to cancel the Arrow.[57]

8. During the discussion the following points were made:

(a) It was debatable whether the U.S. would, in the end, want defensive weapons for their squadrons at Goose Bay and Harmon. It was also questionable whether nuclear warheads would be required for Canadian forces in Canada other than the two BOMARC squadrons.

(b) The public was opposed to storing offensive nuclear weapons on Canadian soil but defensive weapons, particularly for Canada's forces, were another matter. Presumably it would be agreed that Canadian forces should be equipped with the most modern weapons available, over which the Canadian government would have complete control.

(c) Demands for disarmament were not new and there was undoubtedly a recurrent demand in Canada and elsewhere for disarmament at this time which could not be overlooked. But none had ever led to the prevention of war.

(d) What worried Canadians was the fear that the U.S. might launch a war from Canadian bases. It had to be quite clear that what was being contemplated at the moment was the equipment of Canadian forces with weapons for defence only. In defence, the U.S. could not do without Canada just as Canada could not do without the U.S. The statement should insist on Canada retaining sovereignty within the limits of security.

(e) Ministers were agreed on the objective of proper control over the custody and use of these weapons, but it was questionable whether a long elaborate statement should be made at this time when negotiations with the U.S. for the acquisition of the weapons were about to start.

(f) Canada's forces would not be equipped with nuclear warheads for many months, a fact which should be taken into account in the announcement.

(g) The same principles to be adopted with regard to weapons in Canada would also apply in general to the defensive weapons for use by Canada's forces in Europe.

9. The Cabinet, later in the meeting, approved a further draft of a statement to be made by the Prime Minister during the debate on the address with regard to the acquisition and control of defensive nuclear weapons for Canada's forces.

TOP SECRET. EMERGENCY.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

On Monday January 18 in the debate on the reply to the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister intends to include in his opening remarks a statement on government policy with respect to nuclear weapons and on the terms and conditions on which the Government expects to acquire them from the United States. The statement will be along the following lines:

2. Begins. The Government considers it necessary for the Canadian Forces to have a potential nuclear capability in certain defensive weapons that may be required if our defences are to be as effective as possible. Negotiations are now proceeding with the United States to have such weapons made available for Canadian defence units when and if they are required.

3. There are three important points which we have in mind in working out these arrangements.

4. Firstly, these weapons will be used by the Canadian Forces only if the Canadian Government so decides.

5. Secondly, nuclear weapons stored in Canada can be removed from the storage and maintenance area only with the consent of the Canadian Government.

6. Thirdly, there will be joint arrangements for the safeguarding and security of the weapons while they are in storage or in transit in Canada.

7. Once these arrangements are worked out and agreed, we would propose to review them each year to ensure that they are kept up to date with changing circumstances.

8. The same principles would be applied in respect of the Canadian Forces in Europe. Ends.

9. The foregoing are not necessarily the words that the Prime Minister will use, but they do cover the main policy points as approved by Cabinet January 15.

10. The gist of the intended statement has been passed to the American Ambassador who has transmitted it to the State Department. No action is therefore necessary on your part unless the United States authorities should raise the matter with you. In that event you should simply make note of any comments made and communicate immediately with me or the Under-Secretary by telephone.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Shortly after receipt of your telegram, Ivan White (Deputy Assistant Secretary European Affairs) asked us to call at the State Department this afternoon on the basis of the report they had received from USA Ambassador in Ottawa.

2. White said that they fully appreciated the desire of the Canadian government to make a general statement of Canadian policy in this important field. They assumed however that such a statement would follow on from the general lines of the earlier statement of last February, and would not repeat not go into detail with respect to specific arrangements presently under negotiation. They were much concerned at the summary of points they had received as the basis for a public statement for two principal reasons. First, the proposed statement appeared to prejudge the outcome of the important and delicate negotiations now under way (see our telegrams 76 and 83 January 15)[58] and secondly, it could also have an adverse effect on the whole network of arrangements with other NATO allies in this sensitive area.

3. We are relating White's specific comments to the paragraph numbers of your message.

4. There was no repeat no problem with regard to your preambular paragraph 2. On the three substantive points his comments were as follows.

5. "With regards to your paragraph 4, he said USA would prefer the statement to read that these weapons would be used by the Canadian forces only in accordance with NORAD (or related) procedures approved by the Canadian Government." He said by way of example that the key to the effectiveness of NORAD's operations for defence was the advance consultation and prior approval of the two governments to procedures authorizing CINCNORAD to act in situations of grave emergency.

6. Your paragraph 5 presented major difficulties. Provision for joint responsibility with respect to "removal from the storage and maintenance area" goes substantially beyond existing stock pile agreements with other NATO governments, and if such a provision were spelled out in public, there would be instant repercussions in a number of other NATO capitals. The other point to consider is that (as our reference messages have indicated) there is as yet no repeat no precise agreement between us on the definition of "the storage and maintenance area," and any public statement on this specific point would raise real difficulties.

7. Your paragraph 6, no repeat no objection.

8. On paragraph 7 referring to an "annual review" of the arrangements, USA authorities would much prefer a deletion of this reference, and a substitution of a reference to provide for a review at the request of either government (at any time). The reason for their concern here is that there is no repeat no provision for annual review in any other agreement.

[58] Voir les documents 240 et 241./See documents 240 and 241.

9. The substance of paragraph 8 would depend upon the prior principles stated, and on the various related agreements affecting other members of NATO still to be evolved.

10. In response to White's observations which he asked us to transmit to you as promptly as possible, we reminded him that the general principles set out in paragraph 2 to 6 were essentially incorporated in the original Canadian draft with respect to Goose Bay and Harmon submitted some months ago. It will be recognized, however, that for example with reference to the question of removal from storage, as a result of our receipt of USA counter draft of January 15, there are still important definitions to be agreed between us (we spoke on the lines of our discussion of January 15 with USA officials as reported in our telegram 83 January 15).

12. We understand that USA Ambassador will be transmitting the State Department's views directly to you.

Aide-mémoire de l'ambassade des États-Unis

Aide-Mémoire by Embassy of United States

SECRET January 17, 1960

The United States Government is deeply disturbed and surprised that the Canadian Government is planning to make a public statement tomorrow on the storage and use of defensive nuclear weapons although this important matter is the subject of current negotiations between the two Governments.

The United States Government is seriously concerned that it has not been consulted in time on the text of this statement which concerns matters of importance to both countries, which affects its NATO arrangements abroad, and which discusses publicly points still under negotiation between the United States and Canada which have not yet been resolved between them.

With reference to the proposal that nuclear weapons shall be used by Canadian forces only if the Canadian Government so decides, the United States Government suggests that at the minimum this be rephrased to indicate that use of these weapons would be in accordance with NORAD procedures which have been approved by the Canadian Government. Prior approved procedures are the key to the operational effectiveness of NORAD forces. As now phrased there would be the implication that prospective stockpile agreement would contain the express provision that the decision of the Canadian Government would be required before use. The United States considers this a most sensitive point and no such provision has been contained in any stockpile agreement completed or under active negotiation. The proposed statement could lead to most serious consequences in connection with such agreements. Furthermore, if a public statement is made as proposed, this point could cause serious difficulties with efforts to achieve an integrated air defense in Europe which both the Canadian and United States Governments are supporting.

With reference to the proposal requiring the consent of the Canadian Government for the removal from storage of nuclear weapons stored in Canada, as the Canadian Government is aware the United States still has under negotiation arrangements under which weapons would be released from storage in Canada. A public statement as proposed could have serious adverse consequences for other stockpile agreements.

With reference to the proposal that joint arrangements be entered into and reviewed annually for the safeguarding and security of weapons while in storage or transit in Canada, none of the stockpile agreements which have been concluded have provision for review every year. The proposed statement would, thus, run the risk of causing serious problems with other countries.

It is the earnest hope of the United States Government that it will not prove necessary to comment publicly on these points before the two Governments have been able to consult further on the manner of presentation. The United States Government would, of course, see no objection to a statement at this time similar to that made before Parliament last year.

The United States is puzzled by the reference to the Canadian desire to exercise joint custody over weapons stored at Harmon Air Force Base and at Goose Bay for United States air forces under NORAD since it appears to be at complete variance with the Canadian Government's position on this point as enunciated in the Prime Minister's statement on February 20, 1959, before Parliament.

Since the current negotiations have been conducted with the full knowledge of the Canadian Government and with its apparent acceptance that United States law requires that custody of nuclear warheads remain with the United States, it is assumed that custody is interpreted by the Canadian Government as embracing a joint responsibility which will be exercised over the use of these weapons under NORAD plans and procedures as approved by both Governments, whereas custody in the United States sense is limited to physical custody.[59]

Following for Ambassador from Robertson.

Following is text of draft which the Minister read to you incorporating some amendments which are being submitted for the Prime Minister's consideration. You will appreciate this draft is still subject to change. Text Begins:

While I have carefully explained the views of the Government on previous occasions, concern has been expressed regarding nuclear weapons in respect to which negotiations are still under way with the United States.

Canada's stand might be summarized in this way — eventually Canadian forces may require certain nuclear weapons if Canadian forces are to be kept effective. For example, the BOMARC anti-aircraft missile to be effective would require nuclear warheads.

It is the belief of the Government, too, that there should be no increase in the number of countries manufacturing such weapons and therefore, if obtained, they will be from the United States. The principle of United States ownership but Canadian control of use is the general principle.

In these circumstances, negotiations are proceeding with the United States in order that the necessary weapons can be made available for Canadian defence units if and when they are required.

I cannot comment in detail on these negotiations, but I wish to state that arrangements for the safeguarding and security of all such weapons in Canada will be subject to Canadian approval and consent.

I want to make it abundantly clear that nuclear weapons will not be used by the Canadian forces except as the Canadian government decides, and then in a manner approved by the Canadian government. Canada retains its full freedom of choice and decision.

Furthermore, in order to ensure that any agreement entered into is kept up-to-date, it will be made subject to review at any time at the request of either government.[60] Text Ends.

STORAGE AND USE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN CANADA

You may wish to let the Prime Minister and the Minister know that USA authorities greatly appreciate the efforts made over the weekend to meet their very real difficulties in relation to the statement to be made by Mr. Diefenbaker in the House of Commons. At the same time I think that the Prime Minister and Mr. Green should feel quite certain that the Canadian position in this matter has been very frankly put to the Americans.

2. In my judgment, the important thing now is to press on with the negotiation and completion of the actual agreement between the two governments and to ensure so far as we can that the objectives set out in the original Canadian draft are embodied in the final text.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], January 26, 1960

ACQUISITION OF DEFENSIVE NUCLEAR WARHEADS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

I refer to my memorandum to you dated December 7, 1959,[61] under cover of which there was submitted for your consideration a negotiating draft of a proposed Agreement with the United States concerning the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian Forces in Canada and Europe. As explained in the memorandum, the Agreement was intended only to set out the broad principles under which nuclear warheads would be accepted should the Government decide to obtain them. The Agreement would not in any way commit the Canadian Government to the acceptance of such weapons and it would require to be supplemented by further specific agreements for the acquisition, control and use of particular weapons in particular circumstances.

Subsequently (about two weeks ago), we made certain changes in the draft Agreement to reflect views conveyed to us by Mr. Bryce on behalf of the Prime Minister. These changes were as follows:

(a) Paragraph 3 of the Annex to the draft Agreement was amended to give expression to the concept of joint responsibility for the custody of the warheads, with the United States maintaining physical possession, and Canada being responsible for external security;

(b) A new paragraph 4 was inserted to provide that authorization of the use by Canadian Forces of the warheads subsequent to their transfer in accordance with U.S. law, would be the responsibility of the Government of Canada;

(c) A provision was added (paragraph 19 of the Annex) to the effect that the terms of the Agreement would be reviewed by the two Governments at the request of either Government, and that after such review it could be terminated by either Government on six months' notice.

A copy of the draft Agreement incorporating these changes is attached. I think that with these amendments it reflects the three principles enunciated by the Prime Minister in his speech in the House of Commons on January 18, i.e. U.S. ownership, Canadian control of use, and provision for review of the Agreement at any time at the request of either Government.

In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons that negotiation of this Agreement was now under way with the United States authorities, I should be grateful to know if we may now instruct our Embassy in Washington to seek the comments of the State Department on the draft, or if you wish first to consult further with your Colleagues.

STORAGE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT GOOSE AND HARMON

I have been asked to pass on to you the Minister's instructions that the negotiations for the conclusion of an agreement between Canada and the United States covering the storage of nuclear weapons at the United States bases at Goose and Harmon are to be completed before any further attempt is made to negotiate a general agreement covering the acquisition of nuclear weapons for use by Canadian forces at Canadian bases.

270. J.G.D./VI/154.3

Le ministre de la Défense nationale au premier ministre

Minister of National Defence to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], June 24, 1960

My dear Prime Minister:

In view of the attention that is being focussed on the question of acquisition of atomic weapons for our forces both at home and in Europe, I thought it would be useful to bring you up-to-date on the situation and the problems we face. You will recall that last January 6th I forwarded you a memorandum[62] setting out the progress that had been made in this matter, and on January 18th you informed the House that negotiations were proceeding with the United States in order that the necessary weapons would be made available for Canadian defence units if and when they were required.

In the memorandum of January 6th it was pointed out that the preliminary step in obtaining nuclear weapons from the United States was to negotiate a general agreement covering the principles under which Canada would get atomic weapons, which should cover the broad requirements for custody, control, security, safety requirements and the provision of storage facilities.

After a general agreement had been negotiated, it would then be necessary to make specific arrangements with the Supreme Allied Commander Europe, the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic, and the Commander-in-Chief NORAD, on the details of how the Canadian formations under the operational control of those commanders would get the specific weapons called for in their operational roles.

You will recall that the Canadian Government has agreed to a NATO request for the provision of an atomic capability for the Canadian Brigade Group in Europe and we are in the process of contracting for a battery of the 762mm surface-to-surface missile known as the

"Honest John" to meet this agreement. Additionally we are in the process of re-equipping the Air Division in Europe with the CF104 aircraft, which is designed to carry a tactical atomic weapon. This latter commitment was undertaken under very strong urging from the NATO authorities and from General Norstad himself.

It is necessary for us to negotiate with the Supreme Allied Commander Europe and the host countries for the provision of storage for our weapons. We estimate that approximately two years' time must elapse between the start of the negotiations and the completion of the storage facilities. It is further estimated that the surface-to-surface weapon for the Brigade can be available in Europe in approximately eighteen months time, and the present plans call for the deployment of the first squadron of CF104 aircraft to take place in November of 1962. It is therefore essential, if the weapons and the warheads are to be in position in Europe at approximately the same date, that negotiations for the storage arrangements be undertaken as soon as possible. We have been under considerable pressure to allow our representatives to discuss with the SHAPE authorities and the host governments concerned the arrangements under which storage can be provided in Europe, but have had to restrict our participation to non-committal preliminary discussions because of the lack of a general agreement on the procurement of atomic weapons for Canadian forces.

I recognize the difficulty of reconciling Canada's position[63] where we have made commitments to provide atomic armaments for our forces both at home and abroad, while at the same time we are engaging in disarmament discussions which we hope would make these armaments unnecessary. I do feel, however, that we are in a very difficult position in that we are going ahead with part of the programme, i.e., the provision of the weapon carriers, while at the same time we are not taking steps to provide the warheads.

You are aware that, although discussions were undertaken on the military level looking forward to the acquisition of warheads approximately a year ago, there has been no formal approach to the Americans to start the negotiation of a general agreement. I thought it would be useful for me to draw the above to your attention at this time and to urge that we consider making an approach now to working out a general agreement with the United States. No publicity need be given to these arrangements and they need not be consummated until there are further developments in our efforts to secure an effective disarmament arrangement; but at least we would not be in the unhappy position of pressing forward with a very expensive programme[64] without at the same time attempting to ensure that the weapon for this programme would be made available to us if we needed it.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE PEARKES

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

The purpose of this memorandum is to review the current situation with respect to proposals by the United States for storage of nuclear weapons in Canada, and to the question of the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces, so that Ministers may give consideration to these matters prior to the meeting of the Canada-United States Ministerial Committee on Joint Defence to be held on July 12 and 13.[65]

There are five aspects to this general question:

(a) The United States has sought permission for the storage at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base of nuclear air-to-air defensive weapons for use by United States interceptor aircraft under NORAD control.

(b) The United States has sought permission for the storage of nuclear anti-submarine weapons at the United States Naval Base at Argentia for use by United States Naval Forces operating under the control of the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic.

(c) The United States has sought permission for the use of existing storage facilities at Goose Bay for the storage of nuclear weapons for the Strategic Air Command.

(d) The possible acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian use in Canada, especially for BOMARC's.

(e) The possible acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canadian use in Europe for the CF-104 and for the Honest John.

On (a), the Cabinet has given its approval in principle, subject to the conclusion of a satisfactory Exchange of Notes. The first draft of such an exchange was given to the State Department last October, and a second draft, revised in the light of United States comments on the earlier draft and approved by the Cabinet, was conveyed to the State Department last March. Considered United States views on this second draft, a copy of which is attached,[66] are now being awaited. The three most important principles underlying this draft are:

(i) Arrangements for storage will be a joint responsibility of the two Governments.

(ii) Responsibility for their removal from the base will be shared.

(iii) Responsibility will be shared for the use of the weapons.

It is understood that the two aspects of this negotiation causing concern to the United States Government are:

(a) the omission in the draft of any reference to custody, either directly or by reference to the applicability of United States law, and

(b) the stipulation that with respect to storage at Goose Bay the terms of the Goose Bay Lease would apply. One of the provisions of the Lease is that the RCAF Station commander shall have access to all parts of the leased area. This would mean that he would have access to the storage site, and presumably to the weapons themselves.

Action Required

Formal reaction of the United States has yet to be received. If the United States raise no objection to the draft, the Exchange of Notes could be completed as soon as desired.

* * * *

The other four aspects were discussed in general terms at the Camp David meeting of the Ministerial Committee last November. One of the main problems in connection with United States storage in Canada has been to develop formulae which, on the one hand, will meet the requirements of United States legislation and, on the other, the concern of Canadian Ministers regarding control over release from storage and over the use of these weapons.

With respect to the storage of naval weapons at Argentia, the United States side at Camp David expressed the view that nuclear weapons carried on board United States navy ships would not be regarded as having been removed from land storage sites.[67] The Canadian side pointed out that under these circumstances the Canadian Government would not be able to exercise control over release from storage of weapons stored in Canada. Although the United States side urged that an attempt be made to avoid imposing inoperable conditions which would render the defensive use of the weapons more difficult, it was agreed that the question of controls would have to be further explored. However, no further consideration has been given this aspect pending progress on the Exchange of Notes regarding storage of air-to-air nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon.

Action Required

Nothing further until the texts of the Notes regarding Goose Bay and Harmon have been agreed.

* * * *

With respect to the storage of nuclear weapons for the Strategic Air Command at Goose Bay, Canadian Ministers at Camp David made it clear that no decision would be taken for a while. The United States Secretaries stressed the importance they attached to the storage at Goose Bay of nuclear weapons for use by the Strategic Air Command on re-strike missions. The original request had been made as part of the policy of dispersing SAC forces and SAC weapons, a policy which, in the United States view, is becoming more valid as the Soviet missile threat grows in strength. Canadian Ministers expressed the view that storage for SAC in Canada would present great difficulties politically but promised that the question would be further considered by the Government in the light of the views put forward by the United States side. It is to be assumed that the United States Secretaries will raise the matter again.

Action Required

Further consideration of United States proposal by Canadian Ministers before the meeting on July 12.

* * * *

With regard to the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian use in Canada (especially for BOMARC) and Canadian use in Europe (for the CF-104 and the Honest John), a preliminary technical draft agreement was discussed informally some time ago between the Canadian and the United States services and this was subsequently reviewed and revised by officials of the Canadian Government. A new draft of an agreement to cover both these aspects has been prepared by Canadian officials and in it an attempt has been made to provide a formula to meet United States legislative requirements and Canadian Ministers' wishes regarding control over release from storage and for use. This draft has not, however, been considered by Ministers, nor has it been discussed with the United States authorities. The current NATO infrastructure programme includes funds for the construction of storage facilities for nuclear warheads to meet the requirements of the Canadian Brigade in Germany and the Air Division, and the Canadian defence authorities are being pressed by the NATO military authorities to make arrangements to get the construction under way. Arrangements for the storage of nuclear warheads in Europe will have to be made with the host governments in sufficient time before the CF-104 becomes available to the Air Division and the Honest John to the Brigade. A first step, however, would be the negotiation with the United States of an agreement setting out the general conditions for the acquisition of the nuclear weapons.

Action Required

(a) Decision on the principle of acquiring nuclear warheads;

(b) If that decision is affirmative, formal governmental consideration of the draft general agreement.[68]

NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES ON ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES
(Previous reference January 15)

3. The Prime Minister said it would be difficult to devise a suitable answer to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition in Parliament[69] as to whether the government was continuing to negotiate with the United States on the acquisition of nuclear warheads for the use of Canada's forces. He reviewed the statements he had made on this subject starting with the important announcement of February 20th, 1959. He referred to the draft reply which Mr. Green had prepared for his use in Parliament that day and another draft he had prepared himself. The position of the government on this matter remained as it had been stated several months ago, namely that custody would be the joint responsibility of Canada and the U.S. and that the weapons would be used only after both governments had given their approval.

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to his memorandum, which had been circulated, on the question of nuclear warheads for the use of Canadian forces and a number of proposals by the United States for the storage of nuclear weapons in Canada. So far no decisions had been reached on these matters although the arrangements with the U.S. for storage of defensive weapons on the leased bases at Goose Bay and Harmon Field could be settled quickly if the U.S. were to agree to the conditions stipulated by Canada. Negotiations with the U.S. in the formal sense were under way in connection with this particular aspect of nuclear weapons policy but not with any of the others. His department had received no instructions from the Cabinet to negotiate except on this one matter. The whole question was a most difficult one. Control was one of the central issues. So far the U.S. had not accepted Canada's views in regard to control. Until this was done, and an agreement for storage at Goose Bay and Harmon worked out, he felt it would be quite unwise to make any new statement of policy.

(Minister's memorandum, June 24 — Cab. Doc. 201-60).

5. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The previous statements had said, in effect, that Canada would have defensive nuclear weapons, provided the Canadian government shared the responsibility for custody and use. Unless this was assured, Canada would not adopt these warheads.

(b) The question relating to warheads for Canada's forces had arisen at this time because other questions were being asked as to why large sums of money were being spent on equipment and weapons which would not be effective unless equipped with nuclear warheads.

(c) Another reason why awkward questions were being asked was because, on the one hand, one Minister had said that negotiations with the U.S. were proceeding on this subject whilst another had said that they were not. Months ago the Prime Minister had announced that negotiations were under way.

[69] Voir Canada, Chambre des Communes, Débats, 1960, volume V, p. 5881.
See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1960, Volume V, p. 5639.

(d) It was desirable to proceed with one aspect of nuclear weapons policy at a time. First of all, the Goose Bay and Harmon matter should be settled, then warheads for Canadian forces in Canada and under N.A.T.O., and then, later, the other questions.

(e) Against this, it was argued that the weapons for the forces would start to be available in 18 months time. Construction of storage facilities had to be put in hand and agreements made with N.A.T.O. commanders; too much time should not be allowed to go by.

(f) To proceed now might mean the further spread of nuclear weapons, a trend to which the government was firmly opposed.

(g) On the other hand, the government had considered this as long ago as February, 1959, when the Prime Minister had announced government policy on the acquisition of nuclear weapons and on related points.

6. The Cabinet noted the discussion on nuclear weapons policy and on the possible nature of the reply which might be given to the question in Parliament regarding negotiations with the United States for nuclear warheads for Canada's forces.

Memorandum from Clerk of Privy Council to Privy Council Office

SECRET [Ottawa], October 28, 1960

Memorandum for Mr. Dewar

Reflecting on the discussion I had with General Burns on Wednesday, I think one of the most important things we require is a basic memorandum on what Canadian policy should be in regard to nuclear weapons, both for Canadian forces in Canada and overseas, for U.S. forces in Canada and generally in regard to NATO and other countries.

External Affairs are not in a good position to prepare this because Mr. Green is known to hold such strong views. National Defence are apt to think of it too much in terms of the immediate requirements for the Canadian forces. I think you and I are probably the ones that should try to prepare this. Could you give some thought to it in the next few days?

It should take into account some of the long range factors which we have discussed, as well as the immediate problems of the next several years. I shall not be shocked if it ends up with the implication or perhaps the explicit warning that the CF-104 programme for Europe was a mistake on our part.

Think this over for a day or two and we can speak about it early next week.

I attach a paper on this subject which contains a background section dealing particularly with the implications, as I see them, of foreseeable changes in the pattern of deterrence, and a consideration of the factors to be considered in reaching a decision on what Canadian weapons policy should be. I have not, on most points, made policy suggestions, but rather discussed the advantages and disadvantages of alternative courses. By far the most difficult questions are those concerning the Canadian forces in Europe, and indeed the whole pattern of European defence and NATO policy. I don't think that part of the paper is very satisfactory.

I have given a copy of the paper to Mr. Martin.

CANADIAN POLICY ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

General Factors Affecting the Decision

The United States can be expected within two or three years to have for deployment a sufficient number of Polaris-armed nuclear submarines to give her an invulnerable deterrent capability.[70] This capability should have the effect of improving the general security position, because the invulnerability of the system will render any attempt at preventive attack against it useless. It may be anticipated that the Soviet Union will also achieve an invulnerable deterrent base in submarines not long after the United States. If so, the situation will have developed in which each of the two super-powers will, so far as can be seen now, be totally deterred from attacking deliberately the home bases or cities of the other, because retaliation for such an attack would be certain. For the same reason, one can expect that each country will take the most thorough steps to ensure that its system is free of the dangers of reacting mistakenly or prematurely. The invulnerability of the deterrent will also have the effect of decreasing the need for maintaining retaliatory forces at a high level of alertness, further adding to the stability of the deterrent situation between the two countries. Indeed, it may at this point be to the advantage of both countries to dismantle their more vulnerable and hence less stable deterrent forces which will no longer be necessary to their security and which create some risk of war through misunderstanding or miscalculation of intentions.[71]

---

[70] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Strong [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

[71] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Is Polaris [this] good & certain? [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

The achievement of the invulnerable deterrent will tend to create a situation of stability for those countries that possess it, but will not improve the security positions of most other countries except insofar as they can be more confident that war will not break out through preventive action or miscalculation between the super-powers. The security of European members of NATO will not be improved because the United States, feeling more secure behind its invulnerable deterrent, may withdraw from participation in the defence of Western Europe. Although a decision to withdraw may not be taken openly, any tendency on the part of the United States to cut back in its conventional or tactical forces and rely on the Polaris deterrent (wherever it is stationed) will adversely affect European security[72] because the invulnerable deterrent will not be credible as a protection for Europe beyond the time the Soviet Union also comes into possession of an invulnerable deterrent. If both sides possess the invulnerable deterrent, the security provided by it could apply only to those areas on which an attack would be totally unacceptable, that is the homeland of the possessors. It is unlikely that Western Europe can create an invulnerable deterrent of its own in the period before the Soviet Union,[73] with the United States deterred, can credibly threaten to prevent it by force if necessary. And even if the United States is prepared to give Western Europe such a deterrent force before that time arrived, Europe will not within the reasonably near future have the degree of political union that is essential to give the deterrent credibility.[74]

The defence of Europe will as a result become a very difficult problem, and it must be solved in the face of conditions in which the Soviet Union, with the United States strategically deterred, may well feel able to pursue a more provocative policy. Soviet policy and pressures on Berlin, for instance, will likely increase. It is unlikely that the Soviet Union will be prepared to see political union achieved in Europe, let alone the creation of a nuclear deterrent, and if the United States is effectively removed from Europe strategically, the Soviet Union will be able to enforce her demands there by conventional arms, or the threat of conventional arms, without resorting to nuclear weapons. For Europe to attempt in the situation to arm itself with nuclear weapons would be to invite threats of Soviet attack; Europe could hope only to maintain large conventional forces to protect itself from other than Soviet dangers, to reduce the element of provocation to the Soviet Union and to minimize the damage that would be caused by war if it should occur.

It might be considered that for the reasons given above it would be advisable to arm Western Europe heavily now with nuclear weapons, before the mutual and total deterrence of the Soviet Union and the United States have removed Western Europe from the protection of US strategic force. Such a course might be attractive to Europeans, although it is questionable whether the political foundation for such a structure exists or whether the Soviet Union would not, as soon as it achieved its invulnerable deterrent to checkmate the United States, insist that Europe should dismantle its nuclear forces. The fact that Germany would be the key of such an arrangement makes this eventuality more likely. Furthermore, it is questionable whether the United States would see it as being in its own long-term interest to provide strong nuclear forces to a Europe with which it could not long remain in a position of close and senior partnership and which might well become embroiled in a nuclear war with the Soviet Union, of which the consequences for the world could not be foreseen. It would not in any case be in the security interests of Canada to help persuade the United States to provide Europe with such forces, through a NATO agreement, for instance, even though it is in our political and economic interests to have a free and allied Europe.

It is likely that in the future the United States will consider itself secure from China because of its possession of an invulnerable strategic force, although the United States may, of course, think it necessary to provide other types of forces for the protection of its interests overseas which may be jeopardized by China. It may be questionable whether China will feel itself deterred by United States strategic power, although it is hard to believe that the Chinese would, on ideological grounds,[75] seriously risk nuclear bombardment of their country. They might feel, however, that they would be free from all-out attack from the United States so long as they took aggressive action short of an attack on the United States itself. It is likely that the Chinese will continue to work towards the development of nuclear weapons, both strategic and tactical, but will not achieve an invulnerable deterrent in the foreseeable future.[76]

Canadian Policy

Four principal factors, therefore, will probably determine the defence picture in the next few years and provide the context in which a Canadian policy on nuclear weapons should be decided:

(1) With the progressive improvement of the invulnerable deterrent by the United States, the likelihood of a deliberate nuclear attack on the United States will decrease markedly.

(2) The security position of Western Europe is likely to worsen and the likelihood of limited wars in Europe increase.

(3) China will become a nuclear power with at first a limited delivery capability. China is likely to pursue an expansionist policy against which it is difficult to measure what effect strategic deterrence would have.

(4) In the future, when the two super-powers are secure from deliberate attack from each other, but not restrained from pursuing their interests in the world by lesser means, when the security situation in Europe will likely have deteriorated, and when China will be following an aggressive policy in Asia, there is likely to be increased need for and use of international peace-keeping machinery, probably in the form of emergency forces under the United Nations.

A. DEFENCE OF NORTH AMERICA

(i) The decision whether Canadian forces in Canada should be provided with nuclear weapons depends on three factors:

(a) A*n assessment of the threats and of the degree of usefulness nuclear weapons would have in meeting the threats*. The danger of deliberate attack on the United States is likely to decrease markedly as the US deploys the invulnerable deterrent. The danger of intercontinental attack as a result of misunderstanding of intentions is also likely to be decreased, even if the older "unstable" deterrent forces are maintained, by the realization on both sides of their inability to destroy the other's retaliatory forces and of the certainty of a counter-blow. China may represent a growing threat to the United States. It seems reasonable to interpret the extent of the danger to the United States as applicable to Canada also. Although there is some question whether full creditability can be given to the defence of Canada by United States retaliatory power if the Soviet Union possesses an invulnerable

[75] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
? [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

[76] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

deterrent, it is very unlikely that a major power would think it worthwhile to attack Canada except as part of an attack at the same time on the United States.

The judgment to what extent nuclear air defence weapons used in conjunction with any foreseeable carrier system (BOMARC's, interceptors, anti-missile missiles) would reduce the effects of an attack to a worthwhile degree must be a scientific and military judgment. The questions should be raised, however, whether the result would justify the disadvantages of acquisition, as well as whether the probably decreasing threat renders acquisition unnecessary.

(b) The effects of a positive or negative decision on our relations with other countries. It is quite possible that a negative decision would cause difficulties in our relations with the United States unless the United States changes its judgment of the strategic situation. On the other hand, it is not to be expected that a negative decision would cause any serious reaction among our allies overseas to whom the problems of North American defence are remote. A negative decision might have beneficial effects on our ability to oppose the nuclear rearmament of Germany. It would also tend to assist us in playing a role in promoting disarmament negotiations, and would make us more acceptable (and perhaps more capable) of participating in United Nations peace-keeping activities. Our influence and prestige among the non-nuclear powers generally would be benefitted by a negative decision, as would our ability to work effectively for measures to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons.

(c) Morale of the armed forces. It is possible that a negative decision would have an unfortunate effect on the forces' morale. This might be prevented by a clear formulation of Canadian purposes and forces' duties in such areas as service in small, limiting, conventional wars and international peace-keeping activities.

(ii) The desire of the United States to have nuclear weapons in Canada may, if the argument in this paper is correct, disappear after the invulnerable deterrent is deployed in two or three years time. It is very questionable whether the need for deployment of SAC aircraft at Goose Bay or for the provision of tanker bases in Canada will appear justified even to the United States Government after that time, although the United States would probably not now be willing to anticipate such a judgment. Under the circumstances, we might consider making an agreement on the Goose Bay request for about two years with the provision attached that it might be renewed or might lapse at that time.

The request of the United States to station interceptor aircraft in Canada is subject to the same considerations about the likely decrease in the threat and the worthwhileness of the defence provided that apply in respect of the question of acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canadian air defence forces. The situation is different, however, in that the United States cannot be expected to accept the Canadian judgment on the usefulness of these interceptors and that no change of policy concerning the use of nuclear weapons is involved from the United States point of view. If Canada decides to acquire nuclear weapons for air defence purposes, there should be no difficulty in agreeing to the United States request. If our decision is negative, however, it might be wise to agree to the United States request for, say, two years on the terms suggested in respect of the SAC base request. Such a course could be justified on the grounds that it was taken in accordance with a United States judgment of its defence needs, and only in relation to leased bases, and that Canada did not consider that the extent or duration of the threat against which interceptors would be effective or necessary justified the serious change in policy that a decision to acquire nuclear weapons for Canadian use would involve.

B. CANADIAN FORCES IN EUROPE

Our freedom of action in deciding on a nuclear weapons policy in Europe is limited by the multilateral nature of NATO planning. We can hope to influence NATO decisions but we can not set them. If we disagree with the atomic policy of NATO our only alternatives may be to accept the policy in respect of our NATO-committed forces or withdraw these forces. Moreover, our freedom of decision may be further limited by the fact that commitments and programmes in respect of the Honest John and CF-104 have already been agreed to.

We may wish, however, to use our influence in determining the general NATO policy on nuclear weapons which is still undecided. It should be considered whether our interest does not lie in trying to persuade our partners that West European defence should rest mainly on conventional forces, and that Canada and the United States should assist in the strengthening of those forces.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

Judging from scraps of information I have heard from Mr. Harkness and others, I gather it is going to be very difficult to reach agreement on policy in regard to nuclear weapons for the Canadian forces and the means of expressing it. I think you will be hard-pressed in the House during the next month on this matter. We are, as you know, spending millions each month on aircraft to use nuclear weapons in Europe and getting closer and closer to readiness with BOMARC bases that will only be effective if they are equipped with nuclear arms. In addition, they are related to the rather awkward situation we are in in regard to fighter aircraft now that it looks almost certain that the triangular swap deal[77] is not a possibility.

It may be that you want to be able to make a statement on our policy before Christmas because of domestic reasons. On the other hand, this is perhaps one thing that it is best to keep fluid for discussions with the new American Administration next February or March. NATO policy on this matter is also fluid to say the least. Of course the price of postponement is some awkwardness in Parliament and more and more commitment of funds to the aircraft and BOMARC programmes that involve these weapons.

I wondered if it would not be helpful for you to ask Air Marshall Miller, Norman Robertson and myself to report on this subject during the next two or three weeks. We could consider both the substance of the matter and the timing of a decision in relation to the related issues at stake.

[77] Voir la section 3 de cette partie./See Section 3 of this Part.

I would suggest if we do this that none of us should be given firm instructions by Ministers, but simply requested by yourself to do our best to produce a joint report that will outline the problems, the possible alternatives and, if we can, make an agreed recommendation[78]

RECOMMENDATIONS ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

I would suggest that we should ask our staffs to prepare a paper for the Cabinet Defence Committee following our discussion this morning that would provide the background and analysis necessary to lead up to the following recommendations, which I think was the course we agreed on this morning:

1. The Canadian Government should proceed now with the necessary international negotiations to enable the Canadian forces to be in a position to acquire, when and if they need them, those nuclear weapons which it has already been announced that the Canadian forces would be equipped to use — i.e. with the CF-104, the Bomarcs, the Honest Johns, the anti-submarine weapons, and possibly weapons for fighter aircraft in North America. These international negotiations would be undertaken at the same time as we are proceeding with the physical preparations and training necessary for this purpose and on which large sums are already being expended month by month. The Government would say publicly that its policy remains what it has been for the past eighteen months — i.e. preparing to be in a position to acquire nuclear weapons for its forces if and when the Government decides the Canadian forces require them. It should also be understood that all the varied preparations could go forward concurrently, including the preparation of sites and any necessary expenditure on infrastructure in NATO.

2. We should proceed now without delay to conclude the agreement with the United States for the holding of nuclear air defence weapons for U.S. forces at the U.S. bases at Harmon Field and Goose Bay. The substance of this agreement has already been worked out and verbally agreed with the United States and the problems relating to joint custody and control have been resolved.

3. At the Ministerial meeting of NATO in December, Ministers should be prepared to consider on their merits the proposals for putting the Polaris or other medium-range ballistic missiles into Europe or in submarines or other vessels around Europe under some type of NATO control. To the extent that these represent a substitution of missiles for aircraft carrying weapons of equivalent range and yield, they should not be regarded as constituting a new departure in deterrent policy. In so far as they have greater range or yield their relationship to policies as to the stationing and control of strategic weapons should be considered but without reaching decisions until the views of the new U.S. administration are known and stated.[79] In so far as the nature of the NATO control to be exercised over the use of these weapons is concerned, we have not yet seen any practical formulas for the control that appear better, either in principle or procedure, than the type of control contemplated heretofore — i.e. concurrence in their use by the government whose forces would employ the weapons, by the President of the United States who would be supplying and releasing the warhead for use, and possibly by the government of the country from whose territory the weapon would be despatched, plus, if time permits, consultation with the NATO Council.

(a) policy should be consistent with his statements in Hansard, which he enumerated (main ones)

4. It would be clearly understood and stated that Canadian action in acquiring, holding or using nuclear weapons and means of their delivery would be subject to any measures of disarmament or arms control agreed between the East and the West.[80]

My dear Colleague:

I refer to the Record of Decision of the Meeting of Cabinet on December 6, 1960, in which it is stated, in part, that discussions (or "negotiations") with the U.S. Government concerning arrangements for the essential acquisition of nuclear weapons or warheads for use by the Canadian Forces, in the manners already decided, may proceed as soon as they can be usefully undertaken but the acceptance of joint controls to be a basic principle.

In keeping with the above decision, I recommend that action be taken in the latter part of January 1961 to initiate negotiations along the lines of the enclosed draft agreement, which incorporates the features, including joint control, agreed upon in December 1959 by the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions.

It is not certain if Robertson and Miller prepared a paper. The issues raised by Bryce in this memorandum were addressed in the document prepared for the NATO Ministerial Meeting in Chapter 2, Part 7.

It is realized that an agreement of this nature covers only the general principles governing the provision of stockpiles of nuclear weapons for the Canadian Forces and thus in itself will not entail the actual stockpiling of the weapons. Completion of this agreement would, however, establish a basis for negotiation of further detailed arrangements for provision of weapons as considered advisable.

If you feel it would be useful I would be pleased to discuss this matter with you, possibly with senior officials in attendance as you may see fit.

DRAFT OF PROPOSED AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES GOVERNING THE PROVISION OF STOCKPILES OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to Articles 20 and 21 of the communiqué issued by the North Atlantic Council on 19 December, 1957,[81] and to discussions which have taken place in the Canada-United States Ministerial Committee on Joint Defence and between the Canadian and United States Chiefs of Staff, regarding the general principles under which nuclear warheads will be provided to and accepted by the Government of Canada for Canadian forces in Canada and Europe. It is the understanding of the Canadian Government that agreement in principle has been reached in these discussions as to the terms on which stockpiles of nuclear warheads will be made available by the United States for Canadian forces in Canada and Europe.

Without prejudice to the requirement for separate agreements relating to the different types of weapons to be provided in various circumstances, and the storage facilities related thereto, the Canadian Government now proposes that the agreed general principles be formally recorded. My government's understanding of these principles is as set out in the Annex to this Note. If the United States Government concurs, I propose that this Note, together with its Annex, and your reply shall constitute an agreement effective from the date of your reply.

Accept, Sir, etc.

Annex

SECRET

GENERAL PRINCIPLES GOVERNING THE PROVISION OF STOCKPILES OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

A: D*efinitions*

1. In this Annex, unless the context otherwise requires:

"Canada" means the Government of Canada, and "United States" means the Government of the United States of America;

the term "warhead" includes "weapons" where the two cannot practically be considered as physically separate components;

"NATO" means the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; "Allied Government" means any Government, which is allied to Canada and the United States by its membership in NATO;

"Allied Commander" means the Commander of a NATO Allied Command.

B: General

2. Ownership of any stocks of nuclear warheads will remain with the United States. Except in cases when the sharing of storage facilities with other Allied Governments requires otherwise, arrangements for the storage of the warheads will be the joint responsibility of Canada and the United States, to be exercised as follows:

(a) United States personnel, to be provided in the minimum numbers required, will be responsible for the safeguarding and the maintenance of the warheads;

(b) Canada will be responsible for the external security of the storage sites.

3. The procedures under which the nuclear warheads will be released from the storage sites to meet logistic or operational requirements will vary depending on the types of weapons and the operational theatres in which they are to be employed. These procedures will be the subject of separate governmental agreements and will be based on the principle of joint responsibility.

4. Authorization of the use by Canadian Forces of the nuclear warheads covered by this agreement subsequent to their release from storage in accordance with paragraph 3, will be the responsibility of the Government of Canada.

5. The United States will be physically and financially responsible for the provision, maintenance, modification and assembly of the nuclear warheads, including the provision of technical equipment, and of personnel in the minimum numbers required, for these functions.

6. Safeguards in the design of the nuclear warheads will be the responsibility of the United States. The procedure for handling the nuclear warheads to afford the maximum protection of lives and property will be subject to the agreement of Canada. Safety procedures for maintenance, transport, loading, storage and salvage will be at least equivalent to United States standards.

C: Provision of Stockpiles of Nuclear Warheads for Canadian Forces in Canada

7. The United States will be responsible for the movement, in accordance with agreed procedures and in conformity with applicable Canadian laws and regulations, of the nuclear warheads to and from Canada.

8. Except as otherwise agreed, Canada will be responsible for and bear the cost of :

(a) provision of the land required for the storage sites and associated facilities;

(b) construction of the storage sites and associated facilities which, except for those specified in paragraph 8(c) below, will conform with standards and criteria prevailing in NATO, and also their operation and maintenance;

(c) construction, in accordance with normal Canadian standards, of the increments to Canadian administrative installations and facilities (housing, messing, offices, etc.) necessary to accommodate United States custodial and support personnel, as well as the operation and maintenance of these facilities;

(d) transportation of nuclear warheads within Canada, subject always to the provision of paragraph 2 above;

(e) external security for all nuclear warheads in storage or during movement within Canada, and elsewhere as may be agreed, the detailed arrangements to be made by the appropriate military authorities of the two Governments;

(f) a reliable means of signal communication, where necessary, to meet the purposes of this agreement as shall be agreed by the appropriate authorities of the two Governments.

9. Canada will be responsible for arranging for reasonable administrative and logistic support, including that for United States personnel required to implement this agreement. Details of the support for United States personnel will be a matter to be mutually agreed between the appropriate agencies of the two Governments. Each Government shall bear the cost of the pay and allowances of its own personnel.

10. The status of United States personnel in Canada in accordance with the terms of this agreement will be governed by the provisions of the NATO Status of Forces Agreement and any supplementary arrangements which may be agreed upon.

D: Provision of Stockpiles of Nuclear Warheads for Canadian Forces in Europe

11. The location of the stocks to be held in Europe will be determined by the appropriate Allied Commander in agreement with authorities of Canada, United States and the Allied Governments concerned.

12. United States forces will be responsible for the movement of the nuclear warheads into and from the Allied Command Europe Area. Responsibility for movement within this area will be as agreed between the appropriate Canadian, United States and Allied authorities.

13. Storage sites and associated facilities included in NATO infrastructure programmes and allocated for the use of Canadian forces will be subject to NATO infrastructure funding and procedures. Canada will be responsible, in accordance with the terms of Part C of this Annex, for arranging for the provision of facilities in Europe which it is mutually agreed are required for Canadian forces and United States personnel and which are not provided under common infrastructure.

14. Where Canada is the sole user of storage facilities in Europe, the responsibility for operation and maintenance of the facilities and administrative and logistic support for United States personnel will be in accordance with the provisions of Part C of this Annex, subject to agreement with Allied host governments where appropriate.

15. Where Canada is a joint user, with other members of NATO, of storage facilities in Europe, constructed as part of an infrastructure programme, the final determination of the division of responsibilities for the support and external security of the site or sites will be as agreed between the Governments concerned.

16. Canada will be responsible for and bear the cost of a reliable means of signal communication, where necessary, to meet the purposes of this Agreement as shall be agreed by the appropriate authorities of the two Governments.

E. Supplementary Arrangements

17. Supplementary arrangements between the appropriate authorities of the United States and Canada and between these authorities and Allied Commanders shall be negotiated as required for the purpose of implementing this agreement.

F. Review and Termination

18. The terms of this Agreement will be reviewed by the two Governments at the request of either Government and after such review may be terminated by either Government upon six months' notice.

PROCEDURES GOVERNING OVERFLIGHTS OF CANADA
BY UNITED STATES AIRCRAFT CARRYING NUCLEAR WEAPONS

In April last year,[82] the State Department formally requested Canadian concurrence in certain revisions to the procedures governing the use of Canadian air space by aircraft of the Strategic Air Command carrying nuclear weapons. The United States sought three principal changes to Schedule "B" to Order-in-Council P.C. 2307 of April 17, 1952:

(a) The elimination of Category X flights. As flights in this Category would not be carrying nuclear weapons, they could be dealt with by the procedures set out in Schedule "A" of the same Order-in-Council.

(b) Clearances for Category Y flights would be requested in advance every six months at the Government level with individual flights and any modifications to the original programme cleared between the Chiefs of the Air Staff.

(c) Schedule "B" to apply to all United States military aircraft rather than merely to Strategic Air Command aircraft, except interceptors to which other procedures would apply.

2. The Cabinet Defence Committee considered these proposals on June 27.[83] It was agreed that Category X flights might be eliminated from Schedule "B". On the other hand, the Committee did not agree to the proposal for clearances being obtained at the Government level every six months, nor did it agree that Schedule "B" should apply to all United States military aircraft. It did, however, consent to Schedule "B" being altered so as to apply to Strategic Air Command bomber and transport aircraft and, in this way, exclude naval aircraft. Ministers did not wish to appear to authorize overflights of naval aircraft prior to a satisfactory agreement being reached regarding storage of nuclear weapons at Argentia.

[82] Voir/See Volume 26, document 192.
[83] Voir/See Volume 26, document 195.

3. The Embassy in Washington, on instructions, left with the State Department an aide-mémoire conveying our agreement to the elimination of Category X flights, stating that we would prefer the arrangements to be confined to Strategic Air Command bombers and Strategic Air Command transport aircraft (the Embassy was asked to explain orally that the latter phrase would be interpreted as meaning USAF aircraft carrying nuclear weapons on behalf of SAC), and proposing the following language by way of indicating that Ministers would not be prepared to approve requests for training exercises extending over such a lengthy period of time as six months:

> "The programme of each series of exercises will be cleared at governmental level through diplomatic channels. Details of individual flights and any modifications and contingency requirements not included in the flight programme will be cleared in advance between the Chiefs of Air Staff. Each of these flights will require to be authorized by the Minister of National Defence in accordance with the regulations laid down in Order-in-Council P.C. 2307 of April 17, 1952."

The Embassy was asked to explain orally that the Government would be prepared to receive requests for periods up to three or four months.

4. We have now received the comments of the United States authorities on these counter proposals. While our suggestions are generally acceptable, they have raised three points:

(a) The phrase "Strategic Air Command bombers and Strategic Air Command transport aircraft" would create difficulties in that it would not permit overflights of aircraft engaging in routine deployment or re-supply operations by Materiel Command or by the United States Navy on behalf of forces in Europe other than Strategic Air Command or in connection with the NATO programme. Such air transport might also be required eventually to deliver warheads for storage in Canada, both for Canadian requirements and for United States requirements. The United States authorities, therefore, suggest the phrase "Strategic Air Command bomber and United States military transport aircraft."

Comment:

The phrase "military transport aircraft," requested by the State Department, would constitute a widening of the wording "Strategic Air Command transport aircraft" which was proposed by Canada. I think that such a change would constitute an undesirable widening of the terms of the established procedures and should not, therefore, be accepted. I propose that the State Department be informed that the Canadian Government does not accept the suggested amendment and that:

> (i) any nuclear flights over Canada, whether or not covered by the categories set out in the Schedule would, of course, require inter-governmental clearance;
> (ii) any nuclear flights not covered by the Schedule (e.g. overflights by military transport aircraft delivering nuclear warheads to United States forces, other than Strategic Air Command, in Europe or in connection with the NATO programme) would have to be submitted as special cases for consideration by the Canadian Government as in the past.

(b) The language quoted in paragraph 3 above, which refers to "each series of exercises," does not take account of the fact that some flights in this Category are not, strictly speaking, exercises but for re-supply and stockpiling. The State Department, therefore, suggests using the phrase "each series of overflights" rather than "each series of exercises."

Comment:

This language would appear to be required to bring this Category into line with current procedures and practices.

(c) The State Department assumes that clearances for Category Y overflights not falling within a particular programme would continue to be sought at the governmental level, but does not suggest any language to make this clear.

Comment:

It is suggested that this point could be met by adding to the phrase "each series of overflights" in (b) above the words "and individual overflights not part of a series previously approved."

Recommendation:

5. I recommend:

(a) that the amendment to Schedule "B" proposed by the State Department as described in paragraph 4(a) above not be accepted and that the Canadian Embassy in Washington be authorized to inform the State Department that:

(i) any nuclear flights over Canada, whether or not covered by the categories set out in the Schedule would, of course, require inter-governmental clearance;

(ii) any nuclear flights not covered by the Schedule (e.g. overflights by military transport aircraft delivering nuclear warheads to United States forces, other than Strategic Air Command, in Europe or in connection with the NATO programme) would have to be submitted as special cases for consideration by the Canadian Government as in the past.

(b) that the amendments described in sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) of paragraph 4 above be approved.

6. Attached as Appendix "A" is Schedule "B" incorporating the changes approved by Cabinet Defence Committee on June 27, 1959 and indicating the further changes recommended in this memorandum.[84]

SAC OVERFLIGHTS

In your telegram under reference you informed us of the comments made to you by the State Department on our Aide Mémoire of July 10, 1959 concerning the United States proposals for revising Schedule "B" of P.C. 2307 of April 17, 1952. These comments have now been considered by Ministers and attached for your information is a copy of the memorandum on March 15, which the Cabinet approved. Thus, Ministers were unable to accept the suggestion that Schedule "B" apply to "United States military transport aircraft" rather than to

[85] Voir/See Volume 26, document 198.

"Strategic Air Command transport aircraft" in addition to Strategic Air Command bombers.[86] On the other hand, the suggestion that the phrase "each series of overflights" was accepted. Ministers also agreed that specific provision should be made for clearances of "Y" flights[87] not falling into any particular series previously approved.

2. Would you therefore please leave with the State Department an Aide Mémoire, classified Top Secret, along the following lines:

Reference is made to the Embassy's Aide Mémoire of July 10, 1959 containing the comments of the Canadian Government on certain revisions proposed by the United States authorities to the existing procedures for clearing flights of Strategic Air Command aircraft over Canadian territory where the movement of atomic weapons is involved. These procedures are set out in Schedule "B" to Order-in-Council P.C. 2307 of April 17, 1952.

The comments made by the United States authorities on this Aide Mémoire have been carefully considered by the Canadian Government and the Embassy has been instructed to inform the Department of State that the Canadian Government is agreeable that the phrase "each series of exercises" in the paragraph dealing with the channel of communication for Category "Y" flights should be altered to read "each series of overflights." The Canadian Government also believes that to remove any possible ambiguity it would be useful to specify that Government-to-Government clearance will be sought for individual overflights not part of a series previously approved.

To its regret the Canadian Government can not see its way clear to altering the phrase "Strategic Air Command transport aircraft" previously suggested for the title and the explanatory note under it of Schedule "B". In this connection, the Embassy has been asked to point out that the Canadian Government would expect that any nuclear flights over Canada, whether or not covered by the categories set out in Schedule "B", would be submitted to it for clearance through the diplomatic channel and that any nuclear flights not covered by Schedule "B" (e.g. overflights by military transport aircraft delivering nuclear warheads to United States Forces, other than the Strategic Air Command, in Europe, or in connection with the NATO programme) would also be submitted to it through the diplomatic channel as special cases for its consideration as in the past.[88] The foregoing should not be interpreted as a modification of the Exchange of Notes on June 30, 1959[89] regarding the carriage of nuclear air-to-air defence weapons over Canada.[90]

Attached is a copy of Schedule "B" incorporating the changes agreed to earlier by the Canadian Government and those signified in this Aide Mémoire. If this schedule so revised is agreeable to the United States authorities, the Canadian Government would consider it to be revised accordingly.

3. On taking up this matter with the State Department, you should perhaps recall orally certain points made previously with regard to SAC overflights and the revision of Schedule "B". We have in mind the interpretation Ministers are prepared to place on the phrase

You might also say that the request conveyed in your telegram No. 565 of March 4† would be one of the type which Ministers would be prepared to consider as a special case.

SAC OVERFLIGHTS

Yesterday (April 11) we passed to Willoughby (Director, Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs) an aide mémoire in the terms set out in your reference letter. (Rutter, Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary on Atomic Energy, and Burgess, Canadian Desk, were also present.)

2. Willoughby's main concern was with the provision of the aide mémoire that "any flights not repeat not covered by Schedule "B" (e.g. overflights by military transport aircraft delivering nuclear warheads to USA forces, other than SAC, in Europe, or in connection with the NATO programme) would also be submitted to (the Canadian Government) through the diplomatic channel as special cases for its consideration as in the past." He wondered, for instance, whether the request for an eleven day programme of logistic flights which we had approved early in March and which you authorized us to say was one of the type which Canadian Ministers would be prepared to consider as a "special case," indicated that Canadian government would be prepared to consider requests for approval of programmes for logistic flights on a three-to-four-month basis. Rutter thought that if this were so the Canadian proposal would meet USA needs. He emphasized that one of the chief concerns of USA was to facilitate programming of logistic flights to and from Europe which were not repeat not necessarily on behalf of SAC itself. (He pointed out that many logistic flights might be on behalf of both SAC and other requirements like NATO stockpiling.) It was for this reason that the State Department had requested that we agree to Schedule "B" covering "USA military transport aircraft." By way of illustrating the magnitude of the problem, Rutter said that during May and June there would be thirty logistic flights each month. We should be grateful for clarification on this point.

3. A further point of clarification not repeat not raised at the meeting but which might well arise, is the following. Would Ministers be prepared to consider as special cases requests for logistic overflights involving USN aircraft? You will recall it was our understanding that the request of March 4 which we are prepared to treat as a "special case" involved "military air transport aircraft under USAF control."

4. Willoughby also raised the question of procedure which we envisaged would be followed in implementing any understanding. He recalled that when Schedule "B" had first been promulgated in 1952 the Canadian Government had communicated its text to USA government under cover of a letter. He assumed we would do the same again, including in our letter the points made in paragraph 3 of your reference letter. Our own records unfortunately do not repeat not indicate what procedure was followed in 1952.

5. One further point touched upon was the understanding that present category "X" flights would be incorporated in Schedule "A". For our information would this be by way of amendment to Schedule "A" or could category "X" flights be considered to fall under existing categories under Schedule "A"?

SAC OVERFLIGHTS

Following are comments on points raised in your reference telegram:

Your Paragraph 2: For your own information the underlying reason for the decision taken by Cabinet is the desire of Ministers to avoid any codification of procedures for authorization of nuclear overflights other than SAC on the grounds that this might imply that such requests will be approved as a matter of routine. This being the case, we suggest that you tell the State Department that the only advice you can give them is to continue to follow the procedure which they have followed in the past with respect to operations not covered by Schedule "B". Such requests so far as we know have never been submitted on a quarterly basis before and in our judgment it would be neither desirable nor necessary to institute such a practice at this time.

Your Paragraph 3: We do not think it would be useful to put question of overflights by USN aircraft in hypothetical form to Ministers. If or when a specific request is made, a decision can be taken in the light the circumstances prevailing at the time.

Your Paragraph 4: We have sent you by letter the text of the 1952 communication from the Embassy to the State Department. We will send you instructions on the procedure to be followed in the present case after your current exchange of views with the State Department is completed and the Minister of National Defence has taken action to promulgate the regulations set out in the new Schedule "B".

Your Paragraph 5: It is our view that category X flights can be considered to come within the existing categories under Schedule "A" and that consequently no amendment to Schedule "A" is required for this purpose.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], October 12, 1960

SAC OVERFLIGHTS

In my memorandum to you of October 3† on the above subject I sought your approval of the continuation of the present authority for SAC aircraft with nuclear weapons on board to carry out over Canada part of an airborne alert training programme designed to develop an emergency air alert capability. The receipt of my memorandum coincided with the receipt of a copy of a letter† which the Minister of Transport had addressed to the Minister of National Defence wherein Mr. Hees expressed his concern about the difficulties which SAC overflights were causing, particularly with regard to air safety.

Mr. Campbell informed me that in your view Mr. Hees' letter introduced a new element into the picture and that you wished a memorandum prepared for the Prime Minister suggesting that the safety aspects must first be explored before a further extension of the existing authority could be considered. In this connection you will have received a letter from Mr. Hees, dated October 7,† stating that "it was not my intention to insist on immediate action that would cause disruption now of any essential military operations, but rather to indicate that the problem as a whole required prompt attention." Mr. Hees' letter goes on to say that he is "prepared to agree to the airborne alert exercise continuing for another three months. . . on the express understanding that every effort will be made during this period to resolve the most undesirable situation which now prevails." I have received the attached letter† from the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, enclosing his reply to Mr. Hees' letter, and I understand that the United States Ambassador has called on Mr. Fleming, in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister in your absence, to emphasize the importance which the United States attach to this training programme being carried out without interruption. In the meantime discussions have already begun between the RCAF and the United States Air Force with a view to meeting the problem raised by the Minister of Transport; it will not, however, be possible to resolve all outstanding aspects of the problem raised by the Minister of Transport before the current authority expires, October 14.

You also asked for answers to three questions regarding SAC overflights, the answers to which we have sought from the Department of National Defence as we were not in a position to answer them fully. The first question concerns the length of time the present renewable arrangement has been in effect. The answer given us is as follows:

> "The overflight of Canadian territory by United States service aircraft carrying nuclear weapons has been taking place since 1952 under authority of PC 2307 and since that time all flights have been cleared in accordance with Schedule "B", "X", "Y" and "Z" flights of the PJBD Agreement. Each exercise or individual flight was cleared on a Government to Government basis and this system was considered administratively feasible in view of the small number of flights taking place. This procedure prevailed until the end of August 1958 when the United States proposed the carrying out of flights by the Strategic Air Command aircraft on a daily basis from 15 September 1958 to 15 December 1958. These flights were scheduled at four per day, one aircraft taking off at each six-hour interval, the purpose being to test the feasibility and practicability of an airborne alert. Under such conditions, it was obvious that clearance on an individual flight basis was administratively difficult and authority was sought to approve this programme over the entire three-month period. The Canadian Government granted this authorization on 11 September 1958 on the basis that clearance would be sought daily for the flights on a Service-to-Service basis, the RCAF on the Canadian side being responsible for obtaining Ministerial clearance. Under this procedure, SAC submitted their flight details thirty days in advance to the RCAF, who then obtained Ministerial clearance.

"In view of the success of this training programme, a request was made by the United States in February 1959 to continue these flights during 1959 and 1960, the purpose being indoctrination and training of SAC crews as well as the testing of a new operational concept for an airborne alert. The requirement for this programme was recognized by the Canadian Government and authority was granted on 6 March 1959 for the period March to June 1959. Since that time the programme for this training has been submitted and approved for the periods 1 July 1959 to 31 October 1959; 1 November 1959 to 31 December 1959; 1 January 1960 to 14 April 1960; 15 April 1960 to 30 June 1960 and 1 July 1960 to 14 October 1960."

Secondly you asked to what extent is the USAF taking advantage of the permission to overfly Canadian territory. The answer provided by the Department of National Defence is as follows:

"All requests and authorities described above deal only with "Y" type flights and hence all the SAC bombers have been armed with nuclear weapons. SAC has endeavoured to make a maximum utilization of the authority being given and despite weather, unservice abilities, both on the ground and in the air, they have been able to carry out approximately 95% of the flights authorized." (Since June 1959, permission has been sought for up to 12 flights daily.)

Thirdly, you asked to what extent can overflights be considered "training exercises as distinct from an operational feature of a continental airborne alert?" The following answer has been provided us:

"These flights are a training programme carried out by SAC units to produce a capability of keeping a fully armed and fully manned aircraft in the air on a continual basis carrying out operational procedures. They are designed and used primarily for the indoctrination and training of SAC aircrews in the airborne alert concept. They do contain an operational benefit in view of the fact that they are fully armed; however the operational potential is limited because of the small number of aircraft involved."

Under the circumstances I would recommend that the State Department be informed that the Canadian Government would be prepared to approve extension of the present authority on the clear understanding, however, that this authority will not be renewed after December 31, 1960, unless a mutually agreeable solution has been found to the problem raised by Mr. Hees' first letter. This point could, if you wish, be made a further condition to those we always attach to these overflights (no publicity, individual flights approved by the Minister of National Defence, and the right of the Canadian Government to withdraw its authorization at any time should circumstances arise which in its view would make this action desirable).

If you agree with the foregoing, I shall have drafted for you an appropriate telegram to the Embassy in Washington.

SAC OVERFLIGHTS

Ministers concerned have considered the United States request as outlined in the State Department's note to you of September 30 and have agreed to a thirty day extension of the authority which expires tomorrow subject to the usual conditions and with the addition of a further condition to apply to this thirty day period. This additional condition will be found in the final paragraph of the following note which you should present to the State Department.

2. Your note should be in the following terms. Text Begins:

The Ambassador of Canada presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the Secretary's note of September 30 seeking the approval in principle of the Canadian government for a series of overflights of Canadian territory by Strategic Air Command aircraft carrying atomic weapons from October 15 through December 31, 1960. The Ambassador understands that these overflights will be undertaken as part of an airborne alert training programme for the purpose of developing an emergency airborne alert capability. That programme has been the subject of earlier exchanges between our two governments including the Secretary's note of May 18 and the Ambassador's note of June 3, 1960.

The Canadian Government is prepared to give its approval in principle to these overflights for the period October 15 through November 15, 1960. It is assumed that in carrying out this programme of overflights the United States Government will take account of the views of the Canadian Government set out in previous correspondence on this subject.

It is understood that clearance for individual flights will be arranged as heretofore on a service-to-service basis. While no obstacles can be seen at the moment to the provision of the required Canadian clearances during the period in question, it will be recognized that circumstances might arise which would necessitate further consideration by the Canadian Government of the desirability of particular overflights and which could justify the suspension of the overflights over Canadian territory. The Canadian Government wishes to reemphasize the views expressed in previous notes dealing with this subject that in order to prevent the danger of a misunderstanding arising in the minds of the press or the public as to the purpose of the flights, no publicity should be given to these overflights.

The United States authorities will be aware that difficulties have arisen with respect to the application of Canadian air safety regulations to overflights of Canada by aircraft of the Strategic Air Command. It is understood that officers of the United States Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force are currently discussing means by which these difficulties can be resolved. For its part, the Canadian Government is hopeful that a mutually agreeable solution can be reached as it appreciates the importance which the United States authorities attach to the development of an emergency airborne alert capability for the Strategic Air Command. The Ambassador has been instructed to point out, however, that his government will not be able to renew the present authority for a further period should no solution be reached by November

15. He therefore hopes that the United States authorities will do all they can to ensure that a mutually acceptable solution will be found during the time period of the present authority.[91] Text Ends.

3. Please send us a copy of your note for our records.

On handing the note on the above to Burgess (Canadian Desk) he expressed deep appreciation for the speed with which the Canadian Government had met USA Government's request and said that every effort would be made to reach a mutually agreeable solution as expressed in the last paragraph of our note.

2. As we have already mentioned on the phone the last two sentences of the note have been revised to read as follows: "The Ambassador has been instructed to point out, however, that any renewal of the present authority for a further period after November 15 will have to be dependent upon a solution of these difficulties. It is therefore hoped that USA authorities will do all they can to ensure that a mutually acceptable solution will be found during the time period of the present authority."

SAC OVERFLIGHTS

You will recall that you authorized the Ambassador in Washington to inform the State Department that you had agreed to a thirty-day extension of the authority which expired on October 14 for SAC aircraft to carry nuclear weapons over Canada. This extension was granted on the understanding that in the meantime a solution would be found to the air safety problems associated with these and other SAC overflights which had been raised by the Minister of Transport.

Attached is a letter to you from the Minister of National Defence† informing you that as a result of a series of meetings between officers of the United States Air Force, the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport (in which officers of this Department also took part) a solution satisfactory to all concerned has been reached. Attached to Mr. Harkness's letter is a copy of his letter to Mr. Balcer which records the nature of the solution. Mr. Harkness's letter concludes with the recommendation that the authority for SAC overflights to continue until December 31, i.e., the balance of the period requested, be granted as soon as possible. We have learned informally from the Department of Transport that you may expect to receive from Mr. Balcer a letter confirming his agreement to the solution reached.

The nature of the solution reached is essentially technical. Briefly put, however, henceforward SAC aircraft, instead of maintaining their cell formation (not more than three aircraft staggered at 500 foot intervals of altitude, one mile apart) when crossing a designated high level airway (above 23,000 feet), will abandon the cell formation while in the designated high level airway so that all aircraft in the cell will be at the same altitude; the cell formation may be resumed when leaving the designated airway. Above 23,000 feet, cruising flight levels for all aircraft are 2,000 feet apart, the exact altitude depending on whether the aircraft are flying along designated airways or outside such airways, and their course.

On the assumption that you would agree with Mr. Harkness's recommendation, I attach a possible telegram to Washington.†

Also attached, for convenience of reference, is my earlier memorandum to you on this subject, dated October 12,[92] which contains answers to certain questions which you had raised regarding these overflights.
